THE MYSTERIES OF LIFE.

There is nothing more extraordinary, to a reflecting mind, than to observe with what obtuse, dull, common-place impressions, most persons pass through this wonderful life which Heaven has vouched for man. Life is full of mystery. But to many it is only a round of cares and toils—of familiar pursuits and formal actions. They look upon this world as a vast theatre, or an extensive pleasure-ground; the objects are familiar; the very skies are old; the earth is a path-way for them to come and go on errands; the world is a working-field, a ware-house, a market-place—and this, to them, is life. They are ushered into the world but to eat and drink, to dress and dance, to sport a while in open air, and, like the silk worm after it has spun its web, to lie down and die.

But to a sensible mind, life means every thing mysterious, prophetic, trying to the reflections, and touching to the heart. Life indeed, intellectual life, struggling with its earthly load—coming it knows not whence, going it knows not whither—with an eternity unimaginable behind it—with an eternity to be experienced before it—with all its strange remembrances, now exploring its past years as if they were periods before the flood, and then gathering them within a space so brief as if they were but the dream of a day—with all its dark and its bright visions of mortal fear and hope;—such a life is full of mysteries. In our simplest actions, as well as in our loftiest contemplations, and in our most ordinary feelings, mysteries meet us every where, mingle with all our employments, and terminate our views. The simple act of walking has enough in it to fill us with astonishment. Were we brought into life with all our faculties—if experience had not made us dull—we should pause and wonder at every step, and feel a strange and thrilling doubt whether another would follow. Who knows any thing of the connection and process by which the invisible will governs the visible frame? Philosophers have reasoned upon this subject, and have talked of nerves and delicate fluids as transmitting the mandates of the will. But what have they known of this wonderful power by which every limb is moved at our pleasure. No eye of man, or penetrating glance of his understanding, has searched out those secret agencies of the soul in its tenement of clay. It is the mysterious work of God, and none but He can comprehend it.

Anatomists have explained the structure of the ear and eye, yet they have left inexplicable things behind. Seeing and hearing are still mysteries. The organ that collects within the ear the agitated waves of air, the chambers of sound that lie beyond it, after all dissection and analogies, are still unexplored regions of mystery. And then that beautiful orb, the eye, which takes in the boundless landscape at a glance; which measures objects small and great, near by and at a distance, paints within its narrow limits scenes the most magnificent; which brings knowledge from ten thousand objects, in one commanding act of vision—what a mystery is that!

The connection of mind with matter is of itself a mystery. Here light and life mingle and sympathise with dark, dull, and senseless clay. Who can describe the boundless range of thought, or trace its wanderings through the mazy labyrinths of space to its final resting place? That which in an instant glances through the dark domains of hell, then, "swifter than the lightning's flash, flies to the courts of heaven," and ranges the fields of paradise, hath its abode within the narrow bounds of nerves, and limbs, and senses. The feelings that we possess, the virtue that is to win the heavenly crown, flows not to the life-blood, that, in itself, is as senseless as the soil from which it derives its nourishment. Who shall explain to us this mysterious union, tell us where sensation ends and thought begins, or where organization passes into life? Philosophers have reasoned about this, and have talked of the powers of matter, the channels by which the senses communicate with the brain; but their arguments have been futile—they have settled nothing, proved nothing; for they have known nothing.—As yet we have spoken only of the properties of man, and we are ready to exclaim, in the language of Dr. Young, "O what a miracle is man to man."

But we may turn to what portion of science we please to point of observation and will find it is still the same. Every where our thoughts go out into the vast, the incomprehensible; we sooner or later come to a place into which our [illegible] cannot penetrate. Time stretches to eternity, calculation to numbers without number, place to immensity, being to infinite Godhead. Even the [illegible] system, the whole is divided into separate layers, similar to the tendons and membranes of animals, and surrounded by numerous vessels and secretory glands, each performing some important office; the sap is its life-blood; the leaves its respiratory organs; the limbs are kept off in direct reversion from each other, so as to preserve a due balance between the whole; and every part displays the wonderful order and design of Omnipotence.

Nor is there a plant so humble, or flower or weed in the garden, but that unfolds new wonders to the inquiring mind of the mysterious work of God. The goings on of the heavens are not more incomprehensible than its growth as it waves in the breeze. Its life, or that which constitutes its life, who can tell us what it is? The functions that contribute to its growth, flowering, and fruit, the processes of secretion, the affinities by which every part receives the material that answers its purpose, who can unfold or explain them? Even the simplest spire of grass has wonders in it in which the wisest philosopher may find a reason for humility, and the skeptic an argument for faith.

And there are mysteries, too, thickly strewed all along our moral path. There are "mysteries of our holy religion." Wonders of heavenly mercy are displayed in the successive triumphs of truth over the human soul. Goodness in the heart is a mystery. No language can define it, which does not equally need definition. It is a breath in the soul we know not whence; it cometh and it goeth, like "the wind where it listeth"—it is the gift of God. And an! how great and tremendous is that mystery! That amidst the fair earth, amidst ten thousand forms of perfection, where all else is lovely, this monster should have gone forth in his power to crush the noblest and fairest—this is the mystery of iniquity.

Life—I repeat—life is full of mysteries; and I leave off as I commenced, that life is all a mystery.

THE LOSS OF THE LEXINGTON.

The following appropriate reflections are from a sermon delivered in the Rutgers street Presbyterian church, by the pastor, Rev. John M. Krebs, occasioned by the deplorable calamity which befel the Lexington steamboat. The text was Matt. xxiv. 44, "In such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh."—N. Y. Observer.

Your thoughts have anticipated me in the melancholy illustration of this topic, furnished by the terrible calamity of the past week.

On Monday last—laden with precious stores of merchandize, and with the more precious lives of men and women—the ill-fated steamer Lexington left the wharves of this city.

What various emotions filled the breast of her hapless crew! There were some who were sad for the moment because they were departing from the society of beloved friends; but soon, the very excitement of the departure, the presence of the crowd, the buoyant and rapid flight through the yielding wave, the anticipation of other companionships, the natural love of change, or the hope of joyful returning, dispelled the transient sorrow. But there were others, more heavily and acutely preyed upon by grief; hearts that, could we have read them, would disclose a brooding melancholy of despair, for bereavements and for blighted joys. The widowed wife, in the freshness of her bereavement, goes to convey the remains of her deceased husband to the favorite resting place among the graves of his kindred. On the other hand—for in such a scene the most opposite conditions and feelings are crowded into near, but unsuspected proximity—there were perhaps more who indulged a spirit of hilarity. There were some who hoped, within a few hours, to be folded in the embrace of ardently beloved and eagerly expecting friends. The husband and the father trusted soon to meet the endeared circle whom but lately he saw installed in their delightful home.

The long absent traveller, who had escaped the perils of foreign climes, where for years he had wandered and toiled, and had with equal success escaped the dangers of the seas, and the terrors of wintry shipwreck with which our ice-bound coast threatens the mariner, and alas! too often, even recently, has strewn our shores with destruction and death. Such a one there was, who had avoided all other more probable disasters, and thus far safely returned, [illegible] whereas you know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life? It is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away. For that he ought to say, "If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this, or that. But now ye rejoice in your boastings: all such rejoicing is evil." And again I sought to impress you with the injunction of the wise man, "Boast not thyself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth." Ah! who believed, who felt, who of you even reflected on the truthful and solemn thought!—Alas! it would have seemed just as unmeaning, and just as much like the gloomy croaking of a distempered zeal, had they heard it, to many of that crew who embarked on Monday, who never reached the desired haven whither they were bound, who dreamed not of peril or of death, who met the coming of the Son of man in a most unexpected way, and "in such an hour as they thought not!" Was there not fearful truth in the warning? How is it confirmed by this melancholy disaster!

But there were the mighty, and the prudent and the wise, the light-hearted youth, and the delicate and helpless woman. With the eagerness of appetite they sat down to the evening meal; and in the customary solicitude with which all who travel have made acquaintance in similar circumstances, they thought to procure comfortable berths for the repose of the night. But what a fearful surprise disturbs and destroys their security! What shocking forms of death burst forth upon a sudden, to glare upon their eyes and appal their unexpecting hearts. A devouring flame shot from the trusted sources of their speed, ceases to aid their progress through the deep, and gathering its destructive power, it bursts forth in the midst of their company, assumes the mastery of their vessel, and spreads universal dismay, with menances of fiery ruin. Driven to the decks, they rush with frantic desperation to the frail hope of escape furnished by the boats. The safest of these, the life-boat, is disabled, and dashed away beyond their reach, by the force of the still impetuous wheel. The remaining boats are rapidly filled; yet even ere they are launched they are overwhelmed by the panic of escape, and the unhappy voyagers are precipitated into the freezing waters on a night when even by our sheltered firesides we shivered. (Is it an impropriety, here to commit myself to the graphic description of a magnificent, albeit a licentious, poet?)

"Then rose from the sky the wild farewell—
Then shriek'd the timid, and stood still the brave—
Then some leap'd overboard with dreadful yell,
As eager to anticipate their grave;
And the sea yawn'd around them like a hell,
And down they suck'd with them the whirling wave,
Like one who grapples with his enemy,
And strives to strangle him before he die.

And first one universal shriek there rush'd,
Louder than the loud ocean, like a crash
Of echoing thunder; and then all was hush'd,
Save the wild wind and the remorseless dash
Of billows;—But at intervals there gush'd,
Accompanied with a convulsive splash,
A solitary shriek, the bubbling cry
Of some strong swimmer in his agony."

The voyage was ended! Their earthly hopes and fears; their earthly joys and sorrows; and all their concern which, but the moment before they had in earthly things, were forever quashed.

Thus perished, in that dreadful, unexpected hour, one hundred and fifty immortal beings: the whole ships company—commander and crew and passengers—save only some four or five, who were spared by the remorseless billows—who with but "slight chance of reaching any shore," were, after many hours, thrown up frozen and almost speechless—snatched by the hand of Providence from the common death, and left almost alone to tell the tale. All the rest perished! What were their sufferings! what their thoughts! what the emotions of their hearts, ere they slept in icy death, and found their winding sheet in the wintry wave! And to-day, there is mourning in many habitations. "In such an hour as ye think not the son of man cometh."

Which of these dead—even of the pious and thoughtful among them—which of them thought one week ago that then was their last Sabbath on earth? Some of them it may be, worshipped God, and, though they knew not of the desolations of the coming morrow, they met them with the preparation of faith and hope. But others, perhaps, wasted in sin their last day of holy time, and scorned the sound of the "church-going bell"—and they knew not as the sun of that Sabbath went down, that their day of grace was ended. Perhaps others sat in the house of God to hear their last sermon, and yet forgot its admonitions as an idle tale. And others still were thoughtful, and even trembled, when they were told of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come,—but they had not [illegible] "Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will send for thee." Alas! [illegible] "called too late" [illegible] "I tell you nay; but except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish." "But" [illegible] "Man" [illegible] and where is he?

* Proverbs i. 24—32. † Luke xiii. 1—5.

—— For, where are these now?
"Where are the dead? In heaven or hell
Their disembodied spirits dwell."

Their stiffened corpses, buried beneath "thick-ribbed ice," still remain in the deep. But the souls of all of them are in eternity. Some of them, we trust, are with God; but are they ALL in Heaven? Painful as the thought may be—cruel as some may deem it—yet it is not the testimony of "the faithful and true witness," that to men who are "willingly ignorant, the day of the Lord cometh as a thief in the night,"—insidiously and hostilely—"and when they cry peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, and they cannot escape." And "What shall be the end of them that obey not the gospel of God?" But I forbear. I but ask further, "Where shall the wicked and the ungodly appear?" "They shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead." These dead have met their Judge, and they are in his hand.

"As the days of Noah were, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered the ark, and knew not, until the flood came and took them all away, so shall also the coming of the son of Man be." * * "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come." * * "Therefore be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh."—(Matthew xxiv. 36; xxxix. 42, 44.)

THE MAJESTY OF THE LORD.

How great and glorious our God is, who, in himself incomprehensible, appears best by the glorious greatness of his works. If he builds, it is a world, heaven and earth, and the fullness of both. If he gives, it is his only Son out of his bosom, the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person. If he rewards, it is a crown, it is a whole heaven of glories. If he be angry, he sends a deluge; opens the cataracts of a heaven above, and breaks up the foundations of the great deep below, and pours forth whole floods of vengeance; or else he rains down hell out of heaven, and in a moment turns a land like a garden of God into a dead sea, and a lake of brimstone. If he discover himself by any overt expression of his power, though the intention be mere mercy and loving kindness, mortality shrinks from it, and cannot bear it. When his glory descends on Mount Sinai, the people remove and stand afar off, and—"Let not God speak with us (say they) lest we die:" and "Depart from me, O Lord," saith St. Peter, amazed at that miraculous draught of fishes. How much more should the inhabitants of the world tremble before him, when his great and sore judgments are in the earth. Tremble, thou earth, at the presence of God (says the Psalmist,) even when he improves the hard rock into a spring well: much more when a fruitful land he turns into barrenness, or a stately city into ashes, for wickedness of them that dwell therein. I am horribly afraid, said David, for the ungodly that forsake thy law; and I exceedingly fear and quake, said Moses, at the giving of it; but when our Lord shall come again to require it, the powers of Heaven shall be shaken too; the angels themselves (as St. Chrysostom interprets,) though pure and innocent creatures, shall tremble to see the severity of that judgment. How much rather ought we, (wretched creatures that we are,) conscious to ourselves of dust and sin, to tremble and quake at the wrath of this dread Lord of the universe; at whose voice alone the great emperor Caligula runs under the bed; and the mighty Belshazzar's loins are loosed, and his knees knock one against another, when God but writes bitter things against him on the wall.

From Paysons Thoughts.

LOVE OF CHRIST.

In order to form some faint conception of the love of Christ, suppose, my christian friends, that all your toils and sufferings were ended, and you were safely arrived in heaven, the rest which remains for the people of God. Suppose that you were there crowned with glory, and honor, and immortality, listening with unutterable ecstacies to the songs of the redeemed, contemplating the ineffable, unveiled glories of Jehovah, drinking full draughts from those rivers of pleasure which flow forever at his right hand, and tasting those joys which the heart of man hath not conceived. What would tempt you to revisit this vale of tears, commence anew this wearisome journey of life, and encounter all the toils, the temptations, the sufferings, and sorrows which attend it? Must it not be love stronger than death, love such as you cannot conceive of, which would induce you to do this? How infinite, how inconceivable, then, must have been that love which brought down the Son of God from the celestial world to redeem our ruined race; which led him to exchange the bosom of his Father for a veil of flesh, the adorations of angels for the scoffs and insults of sinners; and the enjoyment of eternal life for an accursed, painful, and ignominious death! Nothing but love could have done this. Not all the powers of heaven, earth and hell combined could have dragged him from his celestial throne, and wrested the sceptre of the universe from his hands. No, it was love alone, divine, omnipotent love, which drew him down; it was in the bands of love that he was led a willing captive through all the toils and sufferings of a laborious life; and it was these bands which bound him at the bar of Pilate, which fettered his arm of everlasting strength, and prevented his blasting his murderers.

Unless we could ascend into heaven, and see the glory and happiness which our Redeemer left; unless we could descend into the grave, and learn the depths of wretchedness to which he sunk; unless we could weigh, as in a balance, all the trials, toils, and sufferings of his life; never, never can we know the immeasurable extent of his love. But these things we can not do.—None but the omniscient God knows what he left, or what he suffered; none but the omniscient God, therefore, knows the extent of his love.

To think of the love of Christ, is like trying to conceive of existence which has no beginning, and power which can make something of nothing. Tongue can not describe it; finite minds can not conceive of it; angels faint under it; and those who know most of it can only say, with inspiration, that it passeth knowledge.

THE CRUCIFIXION.

BY MONTGOMERY.

—I ask'd the Heavens what foe to God has done
This unexampled deed? The Heavens exclaim,
"'Twas man!"
And we in horror snatch'd the sun from such a spectacle
Of guilt and shame! I ask'd the sea—The sea in fury boiled,
And answered with his voice of storms: "'Twas man!" My wave,
In panic at his crime recoil'd; disclosed the abyss and from the centre ran.
I ask'd the Earth—The Earth replied, aghast,
"'Twas man!"
And such strange pangs my bosom rent, that still I groan.
And shudder at the past! To man, gay, thoughtless, smiling man,
I went and ask'd him next: He turn'd a scornful eye—
Shook his proud head and deign'd me no reply.

THE INHERITANCE OF THE CHRISTIAN.

Since we stay not here, being people but of a day's abode, and our age is like that of a fly, and contemporary with that of a gourd; we must look somewhere else for an abiding city, a place in another country, to fix our house in, whose wall and foundation is God, where we must rest, or else be restless forever. For whatsoever ease we can have or fancy here, is shortly to be changed unto sadness or tediousness. It goes away too soon, like the periods of our life, or stays too long, like the sorrows of a sinner. And where either there is sorrow or an end of joy, there can be no true felicity; which, because it must be had by some instrument, and in some period of our durations, we must carry up our affections to the mansion prepared for us above, where eternity is the measure, felicity is the state, angels are the company, the Lamb is the light, and God is the portion and inheritance.—Bp. Jeremy Taylor.

FOR THE INFIDEL.

POEM.

BY SIR WILLIAM JONES.

What power beyond all powers elate
Sustains the universal frame!
'Tis not nature, 'tis not fate,
'Tis not the dance of atoms blind,
Etherial space, or subtil flame!
No—'tis one vast Eternal Mind,
Too sacred for an earthly name,
He forms, pervades, directs the whole;
Not like the microcosm's imaged soul,
But provident of endless good,
By ways not seen nor understood,
Which even his angels vainly might explore,
High their highest thoughts above,
Truth—Wisdom—Justice—Mercy—Love,
Wrought in his heavenly essence, blaze and soar,
'Rapt in contemplation meek.
Him fear—Him trust—Him venerate—Him adore.

THE DEATH BED OF AN INFIDEL.

BY RUFUS B. SAGE.

Mr. J—— S—— was a citizen of Rockingham county, Virginia, wealthy and well educated, polished and urbane in his manners, and possessed of talents of no inferior order. But, alas! in younger life he had imbibed a system of "free thinking," which by degrees, had led him to embrace the baseless theories of downright infidelity. His hostility to the Bible and Christian religion was most obstinate and malignant, and his reproach of Christians and Ministers of the Gospel studied and severe. In this manner he passed the most of his life, and sinned away the day of his grace. At length the long suffering of Deity became wearied with the many provocations of his creature, and the messenger of death was sent to execute the commission of mortality and he was laid upon the bed of death.

Oh the death-bed of an Infidel! How awful the thought! Its very name is horror! The dreadful ideas associated with it are doubly verified in the instance before us.

Notwithstanding the reduced state of his physical strength, he retained his senses to the last,—and such a scene of anguish and woe, unutterable, was there disclosed, as seldom falls to the lot of man to witness, and would to God, that such might never again occur! A few friends who were present, gave the following account of the last day and night of his existence on earth.

An acquaintance, upon entering the room of the dying man, enquired how he felt. "Ah me!" he exclaimed, "Dying but to never die! Eternity and unending death! The horrors of the world to come! I know, I feel them! O Lord God, thy name to me is worse than hell! The offered mercy rejected, despised, scorned, and abused, is now transformed into the gnawings of the worm that never dies! But, why ask me thus? I know that you are a merciful man; if so, may I entreat you to prove your humanity by ending my life! Oh! I long to know the worst of my doom! O could I die and be annihilated! But death—death forever flies. The fire is kindled that never, never will be quenched! Ah!—save me! save me!—There,—they come! they come!"—he shrieked, and fell into a fit of convulsions; but shortly recovered, he was asked, who comes? "They, they, the spirits of hell!—grinning horribly, eager to devour my never dying soul!—Ah! I'm lost—I'm lost! Mercy has assumed the flaming sword of justice, and stings me through with ten thousand torments!"

Upon this, one present reminded him, that as long as life lasts there is hope, that Christ never cast off any one that came to him; that with him there is redemption for the chiefest of sinners; and exhorted him to pray for pardon—"Pray! pray! I cannot, I will not! If I should 'tis no use! My lot is cast. I know, I feel! Why, pray to him I hate? Entreat him whom I would destroy? No. I will not. There is no hope, no mercy for me!—The presence of death proves and establishes what I disbelieved, and fondly hoped was not.—There is a God; I see him! To me his frown is death—death eternal! Annihilation I had verily though would be the consummation of my existence; but now I know there is a hell, for I see it! Its flames, yawning to consume, already prey upon my spirit!—Well may I exclaim, as did one in like condition, 'Didst thou but know one half the pains I feel, thou wouldst struggle with the martyr for his stake, and plunge into the fire! That is not an undying flame—that is not an unquenchable fire.'"

Another fit of convulsions succeeded these terrific ejaculations. His features were thrown into the most horrible contortions of agony and despair. Life seemed extinct. In this condition he lay for nearly three hours, when, to the surprise of all, recovering he renewed his piteous and heart-rending lamentations.

"I have been my own worst enemy!—Oh Time, how have I been thy murderer; but now thou art revenged! Oh God, how have I despised, hated, and disbelieved even thy existence! But now I feel that the burnings of thine anger do not sleep alway."

Thus the wretched J—— S—— continued for some time, expressing in broken accents the agony of his soul. One of his relatives asked him if he would choose any particular place to be buried. "Buried in hell!" he exclaimed, "that is my only portion! I have swallowed down my own everlasting ruin! Ah! Ah! Hold me!—They come—Hold me! Hold me!—I go! There! Oh! Oh!" One gasp, one groan, and the immortal spirit had fled to meet its final doom!

His horror-stricken friends gazed at one another with stupified amazement. But the tale of life had been told, the work of death done, and all was over. The image of unutterable despair was enstamped upon the countenance of the deceased.

Thus died the infidel! Let all take warning from his fate; to shun the rock on which he split; the whirlpool which overwhelmed him with the black rolling waves of perdition. There is One who, if made our friend, will guide us safely through the rough and boisterous sea of life; support us in death, and enable us to depart, cheered with a hope full of glory and immortality.

"Sure there is a Righteous God, NOR IS RELIGION VAIN."

DR. FRANKLIN,

AND LEGISLATIVE CHAPLAINS.

Our great American philosopher has not been usually ranked with those, who, among the renowned names of the world, can be claimed as a believer and follower of the Christian. Yet, in the testimony which is annexed, and which we do not remember to have seen before, there is such proof, both of religious faith and practical wisdom, as to outweigh many vague accusations.—New-York American.

MOTION FOR PRAYERS IN THE CONVENTION.—Mr. President: The small progress we have made, after four or five weeks close attendance and continual reasoning with each other, our different sentiments on almost every question, several of the last producing as many noes as ayes, is, methinks, a melancholy proof of the imperfection of the human understanding. We, indeed seem to feel our own want of political wisdom, since we have been running all about in search of it. We have gone back to ancient history for models of Government and examined the different forms of those Republics, which, having been originally formed with the seeds of their own dissolution, now no longer exist; and we have viewed modern States all round Europe, but find none of their constitutions as suitable to our circumstances.

In this situation of this assembly, groping, as it were in the dark to find political truth, and scarce able to distinguish it when presented to us, how has it happened, sir, that we have not hitherto once thought of applying to the Father of Lights to illuminate our understanding? In the beginning of the contest with Britain, when we were sensible of danger, we had daily prayers in this room for the Divine protection. Our prayers sir were heard—and they were graciously answered. All of us who were engaged in the struggle must have observed frequent instances of a superintending Providence in our favor. To that kind Providence we owe this happy opportunity of consulting in peace on the means of establishing our future national felicity.—And have we now forgotten that powerful friend? or do we imagine we now no longer need its assistance? I have lived, sir, a long time, and the longer I live, the more convincing proofs I see of this truth—that God governs in the affairs of men.—And if a sparrow can not fall to the ground without His notice, is it probable that an empire can rise without his aid?

We have been assured, sir, in the sacred writings, that "except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it."—I firmly believe this; and I also believe that without His concurring aid, we shall proceed in this political building no better than the builders of Babel; we shall be divided by our little, partial, local interests, our objects will be confounded, and we ourselves shall become a reproach and a byword down to future ages. And what is worse, mankind may hereafter, from this unfortunate instance, despair of establishing a government by human wisdom, and leave it to chance, war, and conquest. I therefore beg leave to move: That henceforth, prayers, imploring the assistance of Heaven, and its blessings on our deliberations, be held in this assembly every morning before we proceed to business, and that one or more of the clergy of this city be requested to officiate in that service.

FOR THE IMPENITENT.

From the New York Evangelist.

KINDNESS TO THE IMPENITENT.

Within the walls of a gloomy prison in our country, is a miserable company of captives. A few months ago they were freemen in their own native country; and, surrounded with the fond endearments of life, were as happy as they desired to be. Suppose that I should enter their prison, and find one of them stretched upon the floor, and dreaming of the home he had lost, and the friends from whom he had been torn away. In his broken slumbers he speaks, and the names of his wife and his little ones tremble on his lips. He is living over again the scenes of joy and love that were but yesterday his, in all the strength of perfect reality. Would I be the monster to startle him from his slumbers, and wake him to the dismal consciousness that he was a desolate captive in a strange land? If I were certain that he could not be delivered from his captivity and restored to the joys of which he had been despoiled, it would be kindness on my part to let him sleep on, and sleep on, to take the little comfort there is in imaginary bliss.

The impenitent sinner is a miserable captive, under sentence of death, and waiting for the day of his execution to arrive. In the deep stupidity of sin, he sleeps, and dreams that he is happy. The world, with its fond delights, its carnal joys, its vain pursuits, flits before his mind; and in their embrace he fancies that he has all that the heart can wish. If I were certain that he could not be delivered from the bondage of iniquity, and brought out into the liberty of those whom Christ makes free, would I be the monster to disturb his slumbers, and awaken him to the dreadful consciousness that he was a hopeless sinner, soon to die? No. Oh! no! I would let him sleep on! I would sit down by his side, and sing some lullaby in the ear of his soul. That would be kindness. And who would be cruel to a man that was soon to suffer the pangs of death?

But if I enter the prison in which those African captives are confined, and bear in my hand the evidence that they were to be set free and restored to the land of their fathers, the homes of their childhood, the companions of their bosoms—though I found them sleeping, and dreaming sweetly of what they once enjoyed, and in fancy living over again the days of happiness that are fled, still I would startle them from their slumbers, and shout in their hearing the joyful news of ransom, liberty, life, and home. That would be kindness. I should be cruel to let them sleep a moment, dreaming that they were happy, when I had the sober, solid reality to offer.

Thus it is when I come to a company of impenitent sinners, sleeping in their sins. They are in prison; but I come to preach deliverance to the captive, and the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound. What though they dream of happiness, and persuade themselves that they are traveling in the arms of bliss; I know they are in danger of everlasting death. And when I come to bring the glad tidings of salvation—to proclaim pardon, and peace, and eternal life—to offer heaven, and glory, and thrones, and crowns that never fade, and joys that are pure, and satisfying, and unfailing—it is kindness to startle the poor sinner from his lethargy, and cry mightily in his ear, "Awake! thou that sleepest."

It is not unusual for unconverted men, and not very unusual for Christians, to complain of rousing, alarming preaching, as indicating a want of kindness to the souls of sinners. If my friend is sleeping on the verge of a precipice, and unconscious of his danger, is it kindness to let him sleep till he is dashed upon the rocks below, and [illegible]

[illegible] the law so powerfully upon the minds of his hearers that their groans drowned his voice? No. These preachers were kind—very kind; and it were well for sinners if all preachers were like Christ, or, if not like him, like Paul, or even like Edwards.

Sinner—impenitent sinner—love for your precious soul, and a fond desire to do you good, would stir up your friend to warn you of the danger to which you are exposed. I would not desire that you should be roused for a moment before your desolation cometh, and that you should then sink into an eternal slumber. But because I know that you may be rescued, and saved, and raised to the right hand of God, I would beseech you to "arise from the dead." "The wrath of God abides on you;" but that wrath may be averted. The clouds that hang over and threaten you may be dispelled, and the mercy of a reconciled, forgiving God, be revealed. The language of kindness is, Flee from the wrath to come; lay hold on the hope set before thee. Omega.

MISSIONARY GLEANINGS.

The following items of Missionary intelligence we copy from the N. Y. Evangelist.

THE QUEEN OF MADAGASCAR

Continues to oppose all efforts to introduce the Christian religion. Those who embrace it are liable to death.

THE COLORED PEOPLE IN THE MAURITIUS.

These neglected people are deriving some benefit from the expulsion of missionaries from Madagascar, as they are now receiving their special attention.

THE MONGOLIAN SCRIPTURES

Are now printed in regular order, to the end of the second book in Samuel. The missions in Siberia are prospering, although as yet but few converts are numbered.

SERVICES IN BENARES.

Six or seven services are generally held, weekly, in the hot seasons, and more in the cooler. Four more missionaries, with assistants, are required immediately.

PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

This sublime evangelical poem, has been translated in Teloogoo. The power of idolatry in the region of Madras is thought to be greatly on the decline.

THE WORK IN POLYNESIA.

In the navigators' Island 23,000 natives are under Christian instruction. In the Harvey Islands, 3000 children are in the schools. In the Society Islands, congregations are very large. In the Georgian Islands, a gracious revival has been enjoyed, and many added to the communion. The entire scriptures have been published in the language of the natives.

GOSPEL PROPOGATION SOCIETY.

The Expenditures of this Society, for the support of the gospel in the British North American colonies, during the year 1838, amounted to 60,000 dollars. It is conducted by British Episcopalians. About $25,000 are annually expended in the West Indies.

UNDER THE SCOTCH MISSION.

At Bombay, considerable excitement was created by the conversion and baptism of two Parasee youths, in connection with the labors of Dr. Wilson.

THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

600 miles long, 200 broad. It is fertile, and had 90,000 red men for its inhabitants last May. The Kanzas tribe number 1588, are situated on the Kanzas river, in three villages, and have a prosperous Methodist mission. There are three other Methodist missions, within 80 miles, viz: Kickapoos, Delawares, Shawnees. The population has increased within a few months more than thirty thousand; now they are, therefore, more than a hundred thousand, settled for their permanent home.

All the history of the past shows the difficulty of applying the means of improvement to wandering tribes. But, induce them to become fixed and permanent, and more than all, let them be dependent on the produce of the ground for subsistence; then they are within our reach, and from the moment they have a special interest in the country in which they live. Industry then becomes necessary to prolong life, and private property is invested with an interest which the hunter knows nothing of. With industry, and the desire of protection in individual property, are connected some of the most important moral virtues, and there is felt, too, the necessity of some law for protection. In such a condition war ceases to be desirable, and then men begin to see the importance of at least so much education as may be needed in the work of legislative and administrative justice. At this stage, the work of civil improvement may be safely left, in ordinary circumstances, to take care of itself. But as surely as there is in human nature an instinctive desire to improve our condition, so surely may we, as a general rule, expect a people to improve when brought into a condition that admits of [illegible]

[illegible] vent the Indian hunter who is clothed in skins, and dwells in his wigwam, from knowing his Redeemer and discharging piously the duties of his station? Does Christianity consist in living in goodly houses? Is piety necessarily connected with European cloth, or the wearing of a hat? Surely there is no valid reason why the gospel should not be made known to the Indian tribes in every stage of their improvement, or even while they are yet farthest removed from civilization. And if, as is sometimes the case, the holy truths of God's word gain an entrance into the hearts of savages, they will hardly be thereby disqualified from improving their physical condition.

EARTHQUAKE AT AMARAPURA.

A letter received from Mr. Kincaid, dated Maulmain, March 23d, 1839, gives the following distressing account:—

A most appalling event occurred between the hours of three and four this morning. We were all fast asleep, when a rumbling noise, resembling thunder, awoke us; and about ten minutes after, our houses shook with such violence that we were unable to stand, and were obliged to support ourselves by laying hold of one of the posts. The ground near the residency is rent in different places, and large quantities of black sand have been thrown upon its surface.—In the plains, immense caverns have been formed, from three to four yards in breadth, and extending north and south to the distance of a mile and upwards. None of the individuals attached to the residency were hurt; but I am sorry to acquaint you, that the whole of the pagodas and brick houses in the cities of Amarapura, Ava, and Sagaing, have become a heap of ruins, burying in their fall the unfortunate people, who were asleep at the awful moment! The loss of lives is supposed to be great. At this city alone, upwards of one hundred have been already reported. Forty Burmans have been buried among the ruins of the buildings about the palace, and upwards of twenty Mussulmen in the different mosques. Ava is supposed to have suffered most. In a day or two, we expect accounts of the loss sustained in that city and Sagaing.

Another letter says, "the destruction and desolation are most appaling. The three cities are heaps of ruins, wherever there were brick buildings, and pagodas. The waters of the rivers rose up, and flowed back. The great shock did not last above five minutes."

Thus the judgements of Heaven are falling thick upon poor, distracted Burmah. The king knows more of God, and his law, than any other monarch that ever sat on the throne of Ava; and yet he shuts light, and truth and compassion out of his heart. Missionary Herald.

The Missionary intelligence of the United Brethren, for the last quarter of the year 1839, contains the following brief view of their mission in the West India Islands, for the year 1838:

The negro colonies of Great Britain celebrated a joyful day on the 1st of August, when the work of emancipation, begun on the same day in 1834, was completed, by the termination of the apprenticeship system. On this, as on the former occasion, the day was kept as a religious festival; and, as far as our information goes, without any interruption of good order. It is, indeed, a delightful consideration, that this great work originated in Christian principles, and has been executed in a Christian spirit. The external relations of these colonies are, no doubt, deeply affected by this change, and we cannot wonder if temporary difficulties rise out of it, nor can we judge, as yet of its remoter consequences. Meanwhile, according to the concurrent testimony of our missionaries, there has been a visible improvement in the attendance on divine worship, and increased eagerness on the part of the negroes to learn to read the word of God; while the exertions of government, and of missionaries of all denominations, to provide by an extended system of education, for the instruction of youth in the saving truths of Christianity, are going on with unabated activity. Brother Charles Joseph La Trobe, by commission from the British government, has this year visited all its Indian colonies, in order to report on the condition of the negro schools. In the course of the year 1837, several churches, and nine new school houses, were built at our stations. Two thirds of the outlay for the last mentioned object have been supplied by government, out of parliamentary grants for this purpose. This extension of school accommodation increases the necessity for qualified teachers. The last synod determined to send a number of young brethren to these islands, as assistants to the missionaries in the superintendence of the schools, five of whom are already actively engaged. At the same time, the plan of training colored teachers has been extended; and we are thankful for the help afforded us in this object by the trustees of the Mico Charity, which has offered to maintain a number of such pupils cost free. In the Danish West Indies, where circumstances have hitherto been less favorable to regular school instruction, proposals have also been made to introduce a better system. In Demerara, the mission on the plantation Anna Regina has been renewed, after 5 years' suspension, with favorable prospects of success.

Sandwich Islands.—[illegible] The mission schools are chiefly composed of children from four to fifteen years of age. These schools are quite regular in their operations, and many of them taught with considerable efficiency. Some are taught by graduates from the seminary, who are generally worthy and many of them pious young men; and those which are not taught by these graduates, are either under their care or that of some one of the missionaries. Our entire school system has been much improved within the last two or three years, so that nearly all the children in the nation attend a school of some sort pretty regularly. On the island of Maui, the children over four years of age are required, by a law of the governor, to attend school five days in the week. Another fact is, that the children learn to read their own simple and beautiful language with amazing facility. The best readers, and in fact the only good readers in the nation, are among the children. Large numbers of children and youth are also making rapid advances in various elementary branches of learning. The boys and girls in our seminaries are quite equal to those of a similar age in the common academies and higher schools in America. At all the stations there are children who have attained to such a degree of mental discipline and general knowledge, to enable them far to outstrip the adults in acquiring a knowledge of the Bible or any other book. But a most cheering fact is, that some hundred of these children during the late revival have afforded such evidence of piety as to lead to their adoption in the visible family of Christ, and hundreds more, are more or less serious. Such has been the general prevalence of religious feeling, that comparatively little open immorality is now observable among the children.

It is not probable far out of the way to say that there are 12,000 children (we have no very accurate data to calculate upon) capable of reading and receiving instruction from the printed Bible, if they had it; that is, an entire edition as large as can be printed at the Mission presses, could be now profitably distributed among the children of the Sandwich Islands. I said profitably, this is not strong enough. It is questionable whether Bibles could be distributed in any country, or among any class of mankind, with more animating prospects of usefulness than among these children and youth. A point worthy of particular notice is, that the entire mass of the children are very much under the influence and control of the mission.

Among things a native thinks of, after his attention to the concerns of his soul is awakened, is how he shall obtain a portion of the word of God. If he can read, and feels any real interest in the subject of religion, he is not likely to rest until he has obtained a copy of Matthew, Genesis, Romans, or some other part in print; and when he obtains either a part or the whole of the New Testament, he carries it with him wherever he goes, even on a visit to his neighbor's house. And while he carries his good book, he feels that he bears the badge of a good man, a man that has turned to the pono, or to righteousness.—They say while they are destitute, "How can a man see without a light? How can a man find the way in the day?"

DANGEROUS FRIENDS.

Christian, thou knowest thou carriest gunpowder about thee—desire those that carry fire to keep at a distance from thee—'tis a dangerous crisis when a proud heart meets with flattering lips. Take away the fire, (said a holy divine of Germany, when his friends commended him upon his death-bed,) I have yet combustible matter about me. Faithful, reasonable, discreet reproofs, are much more safe to us, and advantageous to our mortifying work—but, alas, how few have the boldness or wisdom to administer them. It is said of Alexander, that he bade a philosopher (who had been long with him) to be gone; for, said he, so long hast thou been with me, and never reproved me, which must needs be thy fault—for either thou sawest nothing in me worthy of reproof, which argues thy ignorance; else thou durst not reprove me, which argues thy unfaithfulness.—Flavel.

THE THRONE OF GRACE.

If you are a Christian, the Throne of Grace is yours. Your Saviour has sprinkled it with his own blood. The Holy Spirit draws you to kneel before it; and the promise, when there, is, "open your mouth wide, and I will fill it." What an honor to approach the King of kings! Were we to have an audience with an earthly monarch, we should deem it an era in our history and boast of it through life. But you and I and others may have audience with the King of the Universe. Nay, we have liberty to approach him at any time and under any circumstances. Have we wants? He can supply them. Are we in trouble? He can extricate us. Do afflictions press our souls? He can mitigate and remove them. Does sin pollute our joys? With Him is the fountain of cleansing. Does Satan vex our souls? He invites us to His arms as our refuge. All relief and every blessing is from God.—Newton.

It is said of one of the ancient fathers, that he would weep at the applause that was frequently given to his sermons.—"Would to God," said he, "they had rather gone away silent and thoughtful!"

I love a serious preacher, who speaks for my sake, and not for his own; who seeks my salvation, and not his own vain-glory.—Fenelon's letter to the French Academy.

It is a solemn remark of Massillon, that "God sometimes, in giving them, makes use of instruments which he afterwards casts away." A thought that may well call to mind, 1 Cor. i. 27, with deep and serious application.

Men will wrangle for religion; write for it; fight for it; die for it, anything but—Live for it!—Lacon.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, March 10, 1840.

OUR PLAN.

We present our readers to-day with the first number of the 'Register,' and with it our best wishes. In entering upon our new vocation, it will be reasonably expected that we should present a brief outline of the principles we propose to inculcate, and the course we intend to pursue in our future labors.

Our primary object will be to promote the interests of religion, by discussing and defending its doctrines, and enforcing its various duties. In the prosecution of this branch of our labor, we shall endeavor to conform implicitly to the sentiments and spirit of the Bible; being confident that the doctrines of that inspired volume are the foundation of every thing intrinsically valuable to individuals and to society.—It will be our aim to state our views with clearness and firmness; to defend our peculiar and distinguishing sentiments with a zeal commensurate with their relative importance; yet, we are determined that those from whom we dissent shall have no good reason to complain of unkindness in our feelings towards them, or unfairness in our treatment of the subjects on which we may differ.

A portion of our columns will be devoted to literary and scientific subjects. No pains will be spared to render this department as interesting as possible, and to promote among our readers a correct taste, and a love for solid information. Approved Narratives, Moral Essays and Historical Sketches will be occasionally inserted, and arranged with a view to amuse and interest the juvenile portion of our readers, by combining instruction and profit with pleasure. It is our abiding conviction that the great objects for which Christian publishers labor, may be best secured by adapting instruction to the young mind in such a manner as to draw it away from such journals as contain light reading only, with which the community is flooded at the present day; and which have no tendency "to guide the life, or mend the heart."

The Miscellaneous department of the paper will receive special attention, and reference will be had to the various tastes and interests of the reading community in our selections.

Our editorial brethren, engaged in the various benevolent enterprises of the day, will find in the Register a faithful ally. Though it may not aspire to be conspicuous among those journals which have earned for themselves an enviable reputation, by their devotion to the cause of Religion, Virtue and Humanity; yet it will not consent to be second even to these, in its aims to do good, nor cease to strengthen their hands in every good work.

The Missionary and Revival departments will be stored with the choicest materials within our reach, both foreign and domestic, and spread before our readers at the earliest possible dates.

For the benefit of those who patronise no other journal, we shall give a synopsis of Congressional and Legislative proceedings during the sessions of those bodies.

The public have already been advised that the Register will assume no political character. It will be deemed sufficient for its purpose to record facts of an interesting character, without any comment either in favor of any political party, as such, or in opposition to it. Such is our plan; and in carrying it into effect, we hope to meet the hearty responses of our friends and the Christian public. Especially do we request the prayers of christians that the blessing of God may attend our efforts, without which, all our solicitude, and toil, and hopes, will be vain.

The following poetical article is so expressive of our views and feelings in the commencement of our labors, that we cheerfully insert it under our head.

For the Register.

THE PRINTER TO HIS PRESS.

I wait to hear thy voice. Ling'ring, thou seemest
To shrink from threat'ning ill; as if thine eye,
Down the long vista of the future, gazed
Upon dark visions. Well may coming years,
With all their varied hues of light and shade,
Appal thee. 'Tis a fearful thing, indeed,
To bow beneath a burden which might make
A giant tremble. And my heart doth yearn,
Mid growing hopes and fears, to lift the veil
That hides thy destiny; for, well I know,
No hermit cell, no cloister nook, may screen
Thy frailty from the stormy wrath of man.

Thy path is on the highway of the earth,
And, like the eagle of some tropic clime,
Thou hast thine eyry near the zenith, whence
Thou wilt look down upon the theatre
Of human life, and with thy deep-toned voice,
Echo its passing scenes. Haste to thy toil!—
Yet stay one moment—Ere thou venture forth,
Thus would I charge thee, in the fear of God:

Be wisely firm. Wear not a cowering crest,
Thou of a noble race! A slave-like mein,
A servile attitude, would ill become thee.
Much better will the manacles adorn
His hand who forges them;—then let him wear them.

And first, thine armor. Ah! it may not be
Of perishable steel. Array thyself,
As the bold champion of Tarsus bade
The loved Ephesian soldiery, with sword
And helmet, sandals, zone, and shield, prepared
By thy liege Lord. Then, onward to thy toil.
For thou, too, warrest not with flesh and blood,
But with the Hydra whose envenom'd fangs
Prey on our nation's vitals, drinking up
Her healthful blood, and with its Upas breath
Doth mar the lustrous beauty of that brow
An angel might have praised.
But other tasks
Are thine. I said thou wast of noble race;
And so thou art, despite the perfidy
That oft has stain'd thy own fraternal ranks.
For they have err'd, on whom the destinies
Of souls were laid, tamper'd with mortal sin,
And deck'd its demon form in robes of light.
And they have seem'd to tread the vestibule
Of death's domain, hold parlance with its king,
And learn'd and lov'd the language of the lost,
With blasphemy denied the Lord Most High,
And sought the Babe of Bethlehem to crush!

I charge not thee, my press, with deeds like these.
As yet thou hast not sinned; and I would pray
Thou shouldst speak wisely, or be mute forever.
Better thou be not, than exist to bear
The trophies of a basely barter'd truth.
Avoid the idle, inconvenient jest,
The sneer contemptuous, and the harsh rebuke.
Deal not in scandals, nor the fuel grant
To slander's midnight torch. And lightly dip
The controversial quill. Yet guard the Truth.
The Truth!—ah! thou shouldst be its champion,
Till the dark corners of the peopled earth
Have owned its influence; till vale, and hill,
And ocean isles, bask in its holy light,
And, in the pious fervor of the soul,
The disenthrall'd, when thou art named, rise up
And call thee blessed!

De Ruyter, March 1, 1840.

SECRET PRAYER.

"When thou prayest, enter into thy closet; and, when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly."

We do not understand that our Lord, in giving this direction to his disciples, intended to prohibit them from praying publicly, at all suitable times and places; but to reprove those whose object it was to be seen and heard of men, rather than to obtain the favor of God. Such seek their reward of men, and "verily they have their reward." Hypocrites may, for a while, by their ostentatious prayers, gain the confidence and applause of men, whilst they have the continued disapprobation of God whose favor they profess to seek.

That men should "pray every where, on all proper occasions, lifting up holy hands, without wrath or doubting," we do not question, since we are so instructed in the word of God. But to secret prayer, in our opinion, a decided preference is given, not only by Christ in the passage above quoted, but by the manifestations of God's presence in consoling, strengthening, and sanctifying the soul bowed in secret before him.

It is important, when we come into the presence of God in the character of suppliants, that every thing foreign to the subjects we wish to bring before the mercy seat, and to which we wish to call the attention of the divine mind, and upon which we wish to elicit the divine favor and blessing, should, as much as possible, be shut out of our thoughts. If our thoughts are confused, or diverted from the proper subjects of prayer, or from a proper consideration of the being we supplicate, we can have no reasonable hope of being heard; but shall go from the presence of God, with a feeling manifestation of His displeasure resting upon us. Every thing, therefore, which is calculated to divert the attention, and to turn the mind off from the consideration of the subjects proper to bring before the throne of grace, should on every occasion of prayer, whether public or secret, be strenuously avoided. Such, however, is the connection existing between the inward and outward man—i. e. the mind is so easily approached through the medium of the external senses—that the train of our thoughts, is liable suddenly to be broken up, through the influence of the objects which surround us. From these causes, the mind, unless drinking deeply into the spirit of fervent prayer, will, most likely, be involuntarily transferred from God, from ourselves, and the proper subjects of prayer, to other considerations—considerations, unconnected with the purposes for which we have come into the divine presence. Again, should not our devotions be interrupted directly through the medium of the external senses, a knowledge of the situation we occupy, may bring with it such an association of ideas, as will cause us to lose sight of the great objects for which we have come into "audience with the Deity;" and thereby render ourselves unworthy of being heard, and our prayers, consequently, remain unanswered. Such a situation, therefore, as will remove us the farthest from the objects liable to interrupt our devotions, and hinder our prayers, is best adapted to devotional exercises. And what situation is better calculated for this purpose, than the place where our Lord directed his disciples to pray.

The advantages arising to our devotions, from a seclusion from the cares, bustle, and intrusions of the world, are not only taught us by the word of Christ, but by his example also. On the night he was betrayed he repaired to the Mount of Olives; and when he had come to Gethsemane, he said to his disciples, "Sit ye here, while I go and pray yonder." Luke says "He went as he was wont, (i. e. accustomed,) to the Mount of Olives." Then, to this place of retirement from the noise and bustle of the city, was Christ accustomed to repair, that he might avail himself of the proper opportunities of prayer and meditation. If our Lord and Master, who, in the days of his humiliation, was above our weaknesses, and for whom it was impossible to sin, found it needful for him to go into secret places to pray, how much more important is it for weak, mutable man, whose mind, subject to the buffetings of the world, is liable to be tossed about, and driven from its moorings, and made the sport of surrounding temptations, unless guarded at all points, and sustained by divine influence, to place himself in the most safe and favorable condition for fervent and effectual prayer.

[illegible] may be urged in favor of public prayer, yet the Christian in the performance of this sacred duty, has been blessed with the divine presence; for his most near approaches to God, and his most blest seasons of devotion, have been experienced at the altar erected to secret prayer. Here he feels that no eye is upon him, but the eye of Omniscience; no ear is open to hear him, but the ear of the Lord. Here no voice mingles with the voice of supplication, and nought is heeded or known, but the sweet whisperings of the Holy Spirit. In this holy situation he is awed by the presence of none, but that of Jehovah, and relies upon none, but the ever-present Jesus; while his full soul is poured out into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth.

The Lord hears and answers, and Oh how delightful the spot, where God pours into the wounded soul the balm of life; binds up the broken hearted and lets the prisoner go free. How sweet thus to hold converse with Heaven, and to drink at the fountain of life, while passing through this desert of moral darkness and wo. Alas cold and dead if secret prayer is neglected. Without it, all our devotional exercises will be formal—destitute of spirit and life. From secret prayer the Christian draws not only his chief consolations, but all those holy and benevolent dispositions of the soul which qualify him for the successful discharge of all the various duties of life and religion.

REVIVALS—PROTRACTED MEETINGS.

It appears by accounts in the newspapers, that there are revivals of religion in progress in various portions of the country, among our brethren of the different denominations. In several of our principal cities, also, there have been large accessions to the churches, and unusual attention to the preaching of the Gospel. Protracted meetings have been held, and attended with the most cheering results. But revivals, we are happy to say, have not been confined to protracted meetings. In several instances where mention is made of the most signal displays of God's power and mercy, it is stated that they have had no meetings of extraordinary continuance. This circumstance, together with the fact that a more general interest is apparent in respect to the important concerns of the soul, and the use of the ordinary means of grace, is particularly encouraging. We trust we do not undervalue protracted meetings. They have doubtless been the means of immense good. They will continue to be useful, provided they are not allowed to impair the confidence of the church in the stated appointments of heaven. That the objects proposed by them should have been misunderstood and misrepresented, is not strange in the present state of society.—The opposition of formalists, and the ridicule of sceptics, may be regarded as good evidence in their favor. But it may be seriously questioned, whether the religion of the present day is not too emphatically a religion of impulses; whether there is not too much dependence upon particular and exciting measures, and too little faith in the word and power of God. Too much care can not be taken to enforce the truth that the word of God will be effectually preached whenever it is faithfully preached; that effectual, fervent prayer, will be availing prayer; and that no instance of faithful obedience will be unaccompanied with the divine blessing. We are happy in the belief, that the church contains in itself the elements of its own purification and advancement; and in the time of her peculiar favor, there will be a recurrence to first principles, while all the means of improvement are retained and employed.

THE PRESSURE.

The pecuniary pressure so severely felt at present by all classes, and the suffering and ruin in business which will doubtless result in many instances from the embarrassed state of our monetary affairs, instead of producing despondency or angry complaints, should be regarded as an instructive comment on the instability of all things and possessions of an earthly kind. Only a few [illegible] since commerce flourished, industry had its reward, and hope smiled on the [illegible]; but the [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] Happy such [illegible] Christ, though they may be poor in this world, how delightful and welcome the invitation to leave the scenes of confusion and disappointment, to be acknowledged the heirs of a glorious kingdom, and enjoy in everlasting fruition, the inheritance of which they now enjoy an earnest by faith.

☞ We send the first number of our paper to some who have not become subscribers, in hope that they will give us their patronage. Those who do not wish to take it, are respectfully requested to enclose and return it to us immediately.

☞ Post Masters and others living remote from our societies, who will obtain subscribers for the Register, and send us the advance pay, shall be entitled to our warmest gratitude. Single subscribers, in all cases, will be expected to pay in advance.

☞ Those who wish to become subscribers for the Register, may avail themselves of the following extract from a letter of the Post Master General, to forward their remittances free of any charge. "A Post Master may enclose money in a letter to the publisher of a newspaper, to pay the subscription of a third person, if written by himself."

☞ To our friends who have often inquired after our paper, we wish to say, that the publication was not concluded on till after the close of navigation last fall, the returns from our agents not having been received in season. We found it necessary to send to New York for the press and other materials of our office, which caused some delay. Arrangements were made for issuing the first number early in February. But after having obtained workmen and commenced our task, we found that on account of deficiency in one letter, we were obliged to suspend operations, till we could send to New York and obtain a few pounds of letter. The damage we have sustained from this cause is by no means inconsiderable, to say nothing of the mortification and perplexity it has occasioned us. Our friends may confidently rely on having the paper regularly and promptly in future, Providence permitting.

☞ We anticipate the publication of our paper this week by several days. This circumstance, together with the fact that we have but few exchange papers from which to extract, will render our news department less interesting than we could desire. It is our intention to make such arrangements as will enable us to spread the news of the day before our readers about as early as it can be obtained by the weekly city journals.

☞ A Convention was held in this village on the 1st instant, in which several of the churches in this Association were represented, for the purpose of devising a plan for the establishment of an itinerant ministry. The Convention adjourned to meet with the second church in Brookfield on the first day following the first Sabbath in April next.

☞ The weather is unusually warm and mild for the season. The roads are excessively bad, the frost being nearly out of the ground.

☞ The Congressional and Legislative intelligence in our possession is rather uninteresting, which, with the press of other matter, must be an apology for its absence this week. So also with our foreign.

REVIVAL RECORD.

We are happy to learn, by a letter from brother James Bailey, that the Seventh-day Baptist churches in Clark and Shelby counties, Ohio, are now enjoying a season of refreshing. Thirty or more hopeful conversions had occurred at the time he wrote. Brother Bailey says he has concluded to go and visit those churches, and labor with them a few weeks. Our brethren there have for some time experienced deep affliction, and we sincerely sympathised with them. We are happy now to share in their rejoicings. It is our fervent prayer that they may long enjoy union and prosperity, and exert a beneficial influence on society around them. Will some brother send us a fuller account of the work among them? It would be [illegible] to our readers.

We [illegible] a revival [illegible] Brother [illegible] a series of meetings [illegible] Will Br. M. or some other brother give us further particulars?

[illegible] from brother [illegible] revival is in progress at the [illegible] society at Adams and vicinity, and that about one hundred persons had lately become the hopeful subjects of pardoning mercy.

In Preston, Chenango county, there exists a very comfortable state of religious feeling. Brother Alexander Campbell, who has held a series of meetings in that society, informs us that there have been a number converted there within a few days. We hope to say more about this next week.

We learn with much satisfaction that an interesting revival of religion is in progress in Verona, N. Y., and that a considerable number have been hopefully converted there within two or three weeks past. Eleven persons were baptized in the second church by brother Alexander Campbell on the last Sabbath in February.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—Being on a tour through the western part of this State, the last of December, I found it convenient to attend the Anniversaries of the several benevolent societies in the county of Allegany, held in the first Seventh-Day Baptist Church in Alfred. There had been much interest manifested by the society in their preparations for the anticipated orators.

On the evening of the 24th, the Peace Society was addressed in a very forcible, and appropriate discourse, by Rev. Mr. Parmele of the Presbyterian Church. After which, interesting remarks were made by Rev. Mr. Allen, and other gentlemen present. The Bible Society held its anniversary on the following day. Addresses were delivered by Mr. Aiken agent of the Society, Rev. Mr. Fuller of the Baptist, and Rev. Mr. Coon and some others, of the Seventh-Day Baptist Church. The assembly was very large, and the services continued till a very late hour; yet during the whole time, the attention of the people was fixed; and a great degree of interest was manifested. In the evening, Gen. Riley of Rochester, held the attention of the audience in an address on Temperance for about three hours; after which, most of those present who were not previously pledged to total abstinence from all that can intoxicate, became members of the society. It was emphatically A GREAT TEMPERANCE MEETING. The next morning, the Anti-Slavery Society held its anniversary, and was addressed by a number of gentlemen. The passage of several spirited resolutions, showed that the people were almost unanimously in favor of immediate, and unconditional emancipation. In the afternoon of the same day, the Sabbath School Union was addressed by the agent, Mr. Tousley, and several others, and although the house was much crowded, and the addresses on that subject, and on that of Moral Reform were very lengthy, the interest continued to increase, from the commencement to the close of the meeting, and the people appeared reluctant to disperse.

Thus I have given you a brief though faint description of one of the most interesting meetings of the kind, I have ever attended. Indeed the unanimity manifested in sustaining the various benevolent institutions, exceeded by far, all I had expected, even among a people who have ever since my acquaintance with them, showed a commendable forwardness in every good work. It is my firm belief, that most of those who attended the Anniversaries, felt at the conclusion resolved to be in future, more patriotic, more philanthropic, and more pious. The efforts of the speakers generally, appeared to be in their best and happiest style, and attended with a divine unction; and nothing occurred to disturb the harmony and good feeling, which happily prevailed. There appeared to be but one feeling, one desire, and one aim: and that, to glorify God, and cherish good will to men. The recollections of that season will not soon be effaced from the minds of those who were present. Truly it was "the feast of reason, and the flow of soul." T.

We extract the following from an interesting letter from brother N. V. Hull to brother James R. Irish, dated

CLARENCE, January 23, 1840.

DEAR BROTHER,—It is now two weeks since I returned home from the west. I was absent from home five weeks, traveled some three hundred and fifty miles, attended [illegible] five times, and administered the Lord's Supper [illegible] by brother Zuriel Campbell. [illegible] and while I was there, he came forward and united himself with the church in that place. Before I left, six other members of the church of which he was pastor followed his example in embraceing the Sabbath.—A number of individuals in Clear Creek, Chatauque county, have also of late embraced the Sabbath. The state of religious feeling in the church here seems to be quite good. * * * * *

I have great distress, and that almost continually, about the ministers of our denomination, fearing that we are guilty of the sin of lukewarmness and unfaithfulness. I do feel that the account we are to give is a fearful one. Brother, if common sinners are lost forever for their crimes, what will be the portion of the minister who proves false to his high trust. Oh that ministers would reflect upon their high calling, and awake to a sense of their duty, and be ministers indeed, and devoted ministers too.

INTELLIGENCE.

DOMESTIC SUMMARY.

A destructive fire occurred at New Orleans on the 11th ultimo. The St. Louis Exchange was entirely destroyed, with most of its contents. Sixteen persons perished in the building. The loss of property in this building is computed at between six and eight hundred thousand dollars; only $250,000 of which are covered by insurance. Subscription papers were opened, and $70,000, were immediately subscribed to rebuild the Hotel. Mr. Martin, its proprietor, is said to have lost $40,000, his policy of insurance having expired only a few days previous.

The body of Mr. John A. Locke of Boston, has been found in a creek near Old Field Point, and taken to the city of New York. A memorandum in his pocket enabled Mr. Dayton, who found the body, to ascertain his name.

By a letter from Hon. R. P. Marvin, (M. C.) published in the Dunkirk Beacon, we learn that the Harbor Bill of the present year proposes to appropriate for various Harbors and works on the northern lakes, an aggregate of about $580,000. An effort will be made to get the early action of Congress on the subject. The writer thinks the bill will pass.

Fire in Buffalo.—The building on the corner of Washington and South-Division streets, known as "Duffy's Theatre," was entirely destroyed by fire on the 14th ult. The great exertions of the firemen prevented the spread of the devouring element, notwithstanding a tremendous gale from the westward was blowing at the time. Two houses for public worship were immediately exposed. A portion of the Library of the German Lutheran Church was destroyed, consisting of some rare works which cannot be replaced in this country.

A reward of $500 is offered to any person who will make such developements as shall lead to the conviction of the incendiaries who set fire to the Methodist Church, in Martinsburg, Va., on the night of the 15th Feb. The church was not destroyed, the fire having been discovered in time to extinguish it.

The Freshet.—Serious and extensive losses have been sustained recently on the Monongahela, Allegany and Ohio rivers. The Ohio was 40 feet above low water mark at one time.

A fire occurred at Springfield, Ohio, on the 14th ult. and destroyed property to the amount of near $80,000; a considerable portion of it was insured.

Ohio Legislature.—A disgraceful fracas occurred between Maj. Buchanan, Speaker of the House of Representatives of Ohio, and Gen. James Allen, Editor of the State Journal. Allen was knocked down several times by Buchanan, he being inferior in muscular strength to his antagonist. It is thought he had not given Buchanan any provocation for the assault. Allen was lying ill at the American Hotel when last heard from.

The internal improvement system is suspended for the present in Illinois.

Rev. Dr. Gadsden, Rector of St. Phillip's church, Charlestown, has been elected Bishop of the Diocese of South Carolina. His competitor for the office was Rev. Stephen Ellicott, professor of sacred Literature in the South Carolina College.

Copper Mines.—The St. Louis Republican of the 25th ult. says, "We learn that some new valuable discoveries of copper have been made on the Current river, in the southern part of this State, about sixty miles from Belleview, and some distance above the former discoveries made on that river. We have not received a particular description of the mines, but if the reports of their extent and richness be true, they greatly exceed any heretofore discovered."

A Perilous Voyage.—A traveler recently undertook to cross the Ohio at Wheeling in a skiff, but finding the current too strong, the ferryman put back and leaped ashore. The traveler had a valise containing $6,300 in gold, which he attempted to throw ashore, but it struck the bank and sunk in fifty feet water.

Maryland.—The Maryland House of Delegates have passed a bill requiring the banks of the state to return to specie payments on the 1st of July, under penalty of [illegible] forfeiture of their charters.

Indiana.—The House of Representatives of Indiana have passed a bill abolishing imprisonment for debt by a large majority.

The Free Press tells us, that the Rev. Mr. Mathew will be in Tipperary on new-year day, where thousands await his arrival to receive the pledge of temperance.—Dublin Journal.

The State Bank of Illinois and branches, have resumed business. Notices have been published by the branches, apprising their customers having accommodation paper, that [illegible] of ten per cent. of the principal.

The Dogs and the Army.—The Washington Correspondent of the Evening Post says:—"An officer of the army, arrived in town last night and brought the gratifying intelligence, that the hounds had surprised an encampment not many miles distance from St. Augustine, of fifty insurgent Indians and Negroes, every one of which were taken without the loss of life, or the shedding of a drop of blood!

The Hudson is again fairly open—steamboats were plying the whole distance on the 27th.

NOTICE.

The friends of the Jewish Mission are hereby requested to forward their funds for its support, without delay, as the amount already expended considerably exceeds the receipts in the Treasury and further labors will depend upon the indications given for their continuance, by replenishing the Treasury.

POETRY.

PASSAGE OF THE RED SEA.

They gaze upon the barren shore—
The foe is in the rear!
In front the angry waters roar,
And no ally is near;
No path-way, save the boiling wave,
More fitted for a nations grave!

But who is he, with lifted hand,
So calmly waiting there?
And can he mark the godless band
Without a rising care?
The Prophet stands, in faith secure,
The promise of his God is sure.

The eye of faith was meekly raised,
Up to the throne of God,
And Israel's tribes in wonder gazed,
As with the potent rod
He bade the swelling waters leap,
Back from the bosom of the deep.

He smites—the angry billows cleaving
From shore to shore in twain,
A passage for the captive leaving
Amid the severed main.
With feet unwet the cohorts pass,
As between walls of molten glass.

EXTRACT FROM MONTGOMERY'S POEM "THE WEST INDIES."

"Where roll Ohio's streams, Missouri's floods,
Beneath the umbrage of eternal woods,
The Red Man roamed, a hunter, warrior wild;
On him the everlasting Gospel smiled;
His heart was awed, confounded, pierced, subdued,
Divinely melted, moulded, and renewed.
The bold, base savage, nature's hardest clod,
Rose from the dust the image of his God.
And thou, poor Negro, scorned of all mankind;
Thou dumb, and impotent, and deaf, and blind;
Thou dead in spirit, toil-degraded slave,
Crushed by accursed avarice to the grave,
The messengers of peace, o'er land and sea,
That sought the sons of sorrow, stoop'd to thee;
The captive raised his slow and sullen eye,
He knew no friend, nor deemed a friend was nigh,
Till the sweet tones of pity touched his ears,
And mercy bathed his bosom with her tears;
Strange were those tones, to him those tears were strange,
He wept, and wondered at the mighty change,
Felt the quick pang of keen compunction dart,
And heard a small still whisper in his heart,
A voice from heaven that bade the outcast rise,
From shame on earth, to glory in the skies.
From isle to isle the welcome tidings ran;
The slave that heard them started into man,
Like Peter, sleeping in his chains he lay,
The angel came, his night was turned to day;
Arise! his fetters fall, his slumbers flee,
He wakes to life, and springs to liberty."

MISCELLANEOUS.

DOMESTIC LIFE.

From an article, written by Richard H. Dana, on this theme, we select the following true and useful reflections:

WHERE TO BEGIN A KNOWLEDGE OF THE WORLD.—Our safest way of coming into communion with mankind is through our own household. For there our sorrow and regret at the failings of the bad is in proportion to our love, while our familiar intercourse with the good has a secretly assimilating influence upon our characters.—The domestic man has an independence of thought which puts him at ease in society, and a cheerfulness and benevolence of feeling which seems to ray out from him, like a soft, bright day. As domestic life strengthens a man's virtue, so does it help to a sound judgement and a right balancing of things, and gives an integrity and propriety to the whole character. God, in his goodness, has ordained that virtue should make its own enjoyment, and that wherever a vice or frailty is rooted out, something should spring up to be a beauty and delight to the mind. But a man of character rightly cast has pleasures at home, which, though fitted to his highest nature, are common to him as his daily food. He moves about his house under a continued sense of them, and is happy almost without heeding it.

THE DOMESTIC ANGELS.—Women have been called angels, in love tales and sonnets, till we have almost learned to think of angels as little better than women. Yet a man who knows a woman thoroughly, and loves her truly—and there are women who have been so known and loved—will find, after a few years, that his relish for the grosser pleasures is lessened, and that he has grown into a fondness for the intellectual and refined without an effort, and almost unawares. He has been led on to virtue through his pleasures; and the delights of the eye, and the gentle play of that passion which is the most inward in our nature, and which keeps much of its character amid the concerns of life, have held him in a kind of spiritualized existence: he shares his very being with one who, a creature of this world, and with something of the world's frailties, is —yet a spirit still, and bright,

With something of an angel light.

[illegible]

With all the [illegible]

the material world about them make their best school, and will be the instructors and formers of their characters for life.

CHILDREN OUR TEACHERS.—The relations of parents and children are the holiest in our lives; and there are no pleasures, or cares, or thoughts connected with this world, which reminds us so soon of another. The helpless infancy of children sets our own death before us, when they will be left to a world which we would not trust to ourselves; and the thought of the character they may take in after life, brings with it the question what awaits them in another. Though there is melancholy in this, its seriousness has a religious tendency. And the responsibility which a man has laid himself under begets a resoluteness of character, a sense that this world was not made to idle in, and a feeling of dignity that he is acting for a great end. How heavily does one toil who labors for himself—and how is he cast down by the thought of what a worthless creature it is all for!

AFFLICTIONS OF HOME.—It is needless to talk of the afflictions of domestic life. Those which Providence sends, come for our good, and their best consolations are found in the abode into which they enter. Of the troubles which we make to ourselves, we have no right to complain. Ill-sorted marriages will hardly bring agreement, and from those of convenience will hardly come love. But when the deep and tranquil enjoyment, the light and playful cheerfulness, the exaltation of feeling and the clear calm of thought, which belong to those who know each other entirely, and have by nature something of the romance of love in them, are told, then will I speak of the troubles of home.

ORIGIN OF THE INDIAN TRIBES.

Wise men, for many centuries, have found exercise for their ingenuity, in attempting to solve the mystery that hung around the question—How these branches of the human family, found so early a planting in regions so distant and so separated by seas, from Asia, the original home of the race? And, though the difficulty probably never will have a definite solution, recent facts show how their emigration might have taken place, and remove all impossibility of the Indians having an Asiatic origin. Mr. Parker, in his exploring tour, states some facts which show that the drifting of small vessels and their crews, from the shores of eastern Asia, over upon the western shores of this continent, is no rare occurrence. He tells us that wrecks are occasionally found on the coast; that in 1833 a Japanese junk was wrecked there, and a part of it even saved. In the same year eleven Japanese were drifted in distress in a junk upon one of the Sandwich islands. And he further states that 'it is not a very uncommon thing, that junks and other craft have been found by whale-ships in the great Pacific Ocean, in a state of starvation, without the nautical instruments, and the skill of the mariners, to enable them to find their way to any port.' These facts show that the founding of the Indian tribes, on the western shore of this continent, is any thing but a mysterious affair. The great number of tribes, speaking languages so radically different, favors this idea of their origin, and shows that they must have come from something like that variety of nations which line the eastern coast of Asia. Then their color much resembles that of the eastern Asiatics. Their languages would of course in this circumstance have degenerated, and become estranged from their respective parent stocks. But perhaps when we acquire the means of a full comparison, we shall find affinities which will settle the question. At any rate, the possibility of their Asiatic origin, is now made so clear, as to silence the infidel argument drawn from their case, and to remove the difficulty of believing that 'God hath made of one blood all nations to dwell on all the face of the earth.'—Puritan.

With men of genius, strong feelings and powerful passions are ever associated; and if beauty is unmingled with the qualities of wild thought and affection—if delicacy and virtue are not admirably blended with mental attractions—the light of love will soon be extinguished, and the general impulses of the bosom chilled by apathy and contempt. Men of intellect may yield a momentary homage to a beautiful woman dispossessed of these fascinations; even a village urchin will chase the gilded wing of a butterfly; but in both cases the external splendor palls upon the senses, and something of an innate character is sought for to sustain the regard which beauty excited. Nothing is so flattering to the feelings of man, as the exhaustless and quenchless regard of a sensible female; and no incense so rich can be offered upon the shrine of a woman's ambition, as the avowed and enthusiastic affection of a man of genius. Beauty! thou art a mean and unmeaning toy, when contrasted with depth of feeling and power of mind; and she who would aggrandize to herself consequence [illegible] high ambition of personal [illegible] in her aspirations to [illegible] of an elevated thinker.

WHAT MIGHT BE DONE WITH THE MONEY WASTED IN WAR.—Give me the money that has been spent in war, and I will purchase every foot of land [illegible] I will [illegible] I will support [illegible] as an able teacher, of righteousness, so that on every Sabbath morning the chime on one hill should answer to the chime on another round the earth's broad circumference; and the voice of prayer, and the song of praise, should ascend like an universal holocaust to heaven.—Stebbins.

SCRAPS.

"See," said a celebrated prelate once to Thomas Aquinas, as he exhibited a basin of ducats, "The Church can no longer say, 'silver and gold have I none.'" "True," replied the ingenious schoolman, "neither can she say, 'In the name of Jesus of Nazareth rise up and walk.'"

Slanderers are like flies—they leap over all a man's good parts, to light upon his sores.

Never consent to hold as your own one farthing which belongs to others.

Beware of feelings of despondency.—Give not place for an hour, to useless and enervating melancholy. Be a man.

FOR THE FARMER.

BEST TIME FOR CUTTING TIMBER.

For many years my attention has been turned to ascertain the proper time to cut timber to insure its greatest durability. I am satisfied that the spring, when the sap flows freely, is the best time to fell timber. I am borne out in this opinion by the following statements that I have collected:

J——— C——— informed me that a detachment of British troops crossed from Philadelphia the 1st day of May, 1777, and on the 3d commenced cutting down his woods for the supply of the army, and at the same time to burn up his fencing, which they completely accomplished. "But," said he, "they taught me the proper time to cut timber to make it last. After they marched off, I found many trees that were not cut into cord wood; those I split into rails, believing at the same time they would soon decay from their being cut in the spring—but I am agreeably disappointed—most of them are as sound now as when made into a fence." This he related five-and-twenty or thirty years after the peace of '88.

Conversing with an old gentleman in the neighborhood of Haddonfield, he told me that in the spring of the year he was making fence. "My fences," said he, "are all of cedar, but falling short of cedar rails, and having none from the swamp, I was induced to cut down a pine tree and convert it into rails to finish my fence; they were the only pine rails I ever made use of. Ten or twelve years after this, when resetting my fence, I found the pine rails so sound that I let them remain; since then I have not seen them, having left my farm." I proposed taking a ride and look if any of them were remaining. We did so, and found a number in the fence perfectly sound. I asked how long they had been there. He replied, between 28 and 30 years.

An old friend related the following: I served my apprenticeship to a carpenter. During my apprenticeship my employer was sent for to build a barn for a farmer in the neighborhood, who was very particular to have every thing done in the best manner. In the old of the moon, in the month of February, he cut down and hauled all the logs necessary for the frame; in the spring my employer was sent for, and when he came to hew the sills, one was so defective we were compelled to get another from the woods to supply its place. Whilst we were building the barn he would frequently lament the loss of the sill cut in the winter, saying, "in a few years I shall have to put in a new sill, for this one will rot," pointing to the one cut in the spring. But, said this old friend, I lived to see the same barn moved, and before it could be effected, they were compelled to put three new sills under it; they were all rotten except the one cut in the spring. This satisfied me that the spring was the proper time to fell timber to insure its lasting well.

Being at Egg Harbor, fitting out a vessel, and in company with several persons, the conversation turned as to the proper time to cut timber for ship building—an old man related the following: I well remember a gentleman coming from Philadelphia to Egg Harbor, and sending for a ship carpenter to build him a schooner. When they entered into a contract the gentleman bound him to cut down all the timber when the sap run, and then take his own time to build her, provided he would get her around to Philadelphia before the winter set in. We all thought he knew but little about cutting timber, and would soon have a rotten vessel. Eighteen years after, said he, I saw the same vessel opened. Her timbers were then sound and in good condition.—Farmers' Cabinet.

A gentleman in New-Jersey who was urged some months since, when the multicaulius fever was raging, to enter into the speculation, and was told how rapidly the trees could be multiplied, sensibly replied, "I must first be satisfied of one thing further, viz: that fools are multiplying as fast as mulberry trees."

FOR MOTHERS.

From the Mother's Magazine.

HINTS FOR MATERNAL EDUCATION.

Under this head it is proposed to present, in the Mothers' Magazine, a series of brief articles which shall embody some of the elementary principles of domestic education, to aid mothers in preparing their children for the active duties of life. Instead of attempting to present a perfect system no more can be expected than to lay down some general rules by which the parent may be aided in the discharge of duty, and children be made [illegible] at the instruction of the maternal fireside.

Previous to entering on the main subject, which is proposed in these articles, it will be important to suggest some considerations for the attention of the mother, a regard to which will be essential to a successful application of those principles which may be suggested.

I. THE SOLEMN RESPONSIBILITY OF THE MATERNAL RELATION.

1. You have given birth to a rational and an immortal creature. Not simply to your house, an infant child, but to society, a member, to the government of God, a subject, to the kingdom of heaven or to hell, an undying spirit.

2. This child is not entrusted to angels, but to you in all the imperfection and weakness of our nature.

3. Its own nature is not pure and holy, nor are its susceptibilities, those of virtue alone.

4. The world upon which it is thrown is a world of sin, passion, temptation, and trial; and on you rests the responsibility of seeing that it makes the voyage of life in safety, and ultimately reaches that happy destination, to which God in mercy points it.

5. While its susceptibilitities of virtue are dying away and its native principles of selfishness and sin are growing stronger and stronger every hour, and while you cannot entrust its moral culture to other hands, your opportunities of doing good to it are rapidly passing away, and you, with your child, are soon to appear in judgement, and witness its endless destination; you are called upon to study the best means and to adopt the most judicious measures to secure its virtue and eternal life.

6. One more consideration—God, in his word and in his providence, has connected the best interest of your child here, and the proffered blessings of heaven, with your fidelity for prayer.

How, then, as a Mother, you may well inquire, shall I be able to secure the great ends of that domestic relation into which I am thrown? The proposed articles which may follow, are designed to answer this question.

II. THE MOTHER MUST INCULCATE ON HER CHILDREN THE SPIRIT, AND SECURE THE EXERCISE, OF IMPLICIT OBEDIENCE.

The domestic constitution is primarily for the benefit of children. Their safety, their happiness, and their all, depend on yielding without reserve, to parental supervision. They should be made to look for guidance to parental counsel, as well as to borrow protection, and support from parental care. Nothing is more unlovely, or more severely denounced in the word of God, than filial disobedience. It seems to presuppose the abandonment of every kind and virtuous principle, and a reckless hazarding of every thing valuable. The foundation of this disobedience is often, if not generally, laid in maternal indulgence; and in maternal indulgence too in the very first months of the infant's existence, the time when it is the most necessary to secure its implicit obedience. Hence, as you value the safety, happiness, and reputation of your children, subject them early, subject them perfectly, to implicit obedience. Early, that they may not feel it—perfectly, that they may not seek opportunities to violate it.

Your children are to become subjects of human government, and of divine control. They are to become members of society, where there must be forbearance, concession, and sacrifice of interest and feeling, such as selfish nature, strengthened, as it often is by parental indulgence, is not willing to make. Unless selfish nature is subdued, and made yielding and obedient in infancy, it will always seek to rise and rule in advanced life. Every child should be made to feel that parental precept is law—parental authority, absolute and sacred. Let parental precept be once disregarded, and half its value is gone: let parental authority be once broken, and it is lost. "Authority must be absolute, that it may not be severe."

As a mother, you owe yourself a duty, as well as a duty to your offspring, and to the community. You wish to secure the easiest and happiest method of maternal discipline, not for the passing moment, but for years. You will be ruled, and severely ruled, as long as your children live beneath your roof, unless you early, and effectually secure from them implicit obedience. As this is secured, you prepare them for society, to feel its claims, to yield their private pleasure to its higher good. Men are made monsters in life, by indulgence in infancy. The convict of law, the prison, and the scaffold, is prepared for his hopeless destiny, by parental indulgence. And the most daring and desperate in rebellion against God have had the foundation of their revolt laid here. The commands of Heaven, imperative as eternal law, will fail to curb those restless passions which never knew restraint.

This embraces a vast portion of parental discipline, and requires no ordinary prudence and caution to secure its high and permanent advantage. And here let it be remembered, that the mother must secure respect for her precepts, and obedience to her authority, without calling in the aid of a father's sterner injunction; and if ever this is required, it should be to show peculiar disapprobation, and to inflict a heavy penalty for disregard of a mother's prerogatives. And every wise and virtuous husband will seek to make his wife a sovereign with himself in domestic government.

Filial obedience assumes its most lovely form and engaging features, when it leaves to the parent the power to know that it is required to govern; when by anticipating obedience it takes away the pre[illegible] to command, meeting a parent's pleasure ere it is expressed. To secure this charming obedience, let the mother so [illegible] a gentle sway. So [illegible] the reins of government lie, though never fallen from your hand, that the proud and chafened passions may never be found [illegible] beneath your check. "Lose not the parent in the ruler; above all, lose not the parent and the ruler in the tyrant." Set your eye and your heart on something like Christian discipline, and make Christ your example, who, while he lays upon his children his yoke and his burdens too, renders that yoke easy, and his burdens light, by making it a pleasure to bear them. Let it be seen that your happiness, and the happiness of your children, lies in the line of their obedience, and before it let your countenance brighten with sweet smiles of pleasure and approbation, as it would sink in sorrow when it is withheld. Thus you will render obedience cheerful and happy, and even secure it before you have had time to command.

There are certain securities to this great excellence of paternal discipline.

1. As has been remarked, it should commence early.

2. It should be administered and required with unbroken constancy.

3. It should be attended with uniform kindness, never in arbitrary severity, or in retaliation for past delinquency.

4. It should be attended with proofs of reasonableness and equity.

5. It should be done as a religious duty, and in view of religious considerations, which should never be withheld from the child who is old enough to understand them.

6. Above all, let it be administered in the sweet temper of parental kindness; and if severity must be inflicted, let it be attended with a melting expression of sorrow, that there can be perversion enough to demand coercion.

At all times train those affections "which best suit the filial nature, and which become the chief element of every other affection that adorns in after life, the friend, the citizen, the lover of mankind. Remember, half the authority of the parent is in the love which she excites, in that zeal to obey, which is scarcely felt as obedience, when a wish is expressed, and in that ready imitation of the virtues that are loved, which does not require even the expression of a wish, but, without command, becomes all which a virtuous parent could have commanded."

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE CHILD IN HEAVEN.

A little child who loves to pray,
And read his Bible, too,
Shall fly above the sky, one day,
And sing as angels do:
Shall live in heaven, that world above,
Where all is joy, and peace, and love.

Look up, dear children, see that star,
Which shines so brightly there;
But you shall brighter shine, by far,
When in that world so fair;
A harp of gold you each shall have,
And sing the power of Christ to save.

THOMAS:

OR, THE STORY OF A DEAF AND DUMB BOY.

MY YOUNG FRIENDS,—Many of you know that there are some little boys and girls who can not hear. They can not hear the voices of their parents, or of their brothers and sisters. They can not hear the birds that sing in the grove, and sometimes come and cheer with their song the garden or the way-side. They can not hear the hymns that are sung in the church; no, nor can they hear what the minister says.

And these little boys and girls, because they can not hear, never learn to speak. If you had always been so deaf that you could not hear a cannon when it is fired, and had never heard what people say when they speak, you would never have acquired the use of speech. You would not know how to use your tongues, and lips, and breath, in giving utterance to words; that is, you would not know what kind of sounds to make. Oh, do you not pity little children who can not hear?

Some very kind people have established Asylums (as they are called) where deaf and dumb children are taught to express their thoughts, and to tell their feelings and wants, by making signs with their fingers and hands. And then they teach them how to form letters of the alphabet, and to write words on little slates; and they tell them what the words mean, until they are able to write down their thoughts, and write letters home to their friends, and read the Bible and other books as well and as fast as children who can hear and speak. There is such an Asylum at Hartford. Many of my little readers who reside in Hartford, have, I doubt not, seen the beautiful building, with the spacious and cleanly yard in front, where these children are instructed; perhaps they have visited it, and have seen their bright and cheerful countenances, while engaged in their recreations or studies.

A few days ago, I was engaged in conversation with a youth who belonged to this unfortunate class of your fellow beings. He had been a pupil in the Asylum at Hartford. He had very kind parents, who spared no pains or expense to give him instruction; and when he was seven years old, they carried him to Hartford, and placed him in the Asylum. Here he learned to read and to write. The way in which I conversed with him was this: He brought his slate to me, and I wrote questions upon it, and he wrote the answers under the questions. I was very happy to find that he loved to converse about religion better than any thing else. He loved to ask me, and to have me tell him, about the love of Christ.

Nearly two years ago, Thomas, (for this was his name,) when at Hartford attending the Asylum, was led to think about his soul, and its danger of being lost. A great many people in Hartford, at that time, were talking and thinking a great deal about religion, and many thought they became Christians. Thomas wrote letters home to his mother at New London, and told her all about his feelings. His parents, as you may well suppose, were much rejoiced, and bore him on their prayers to God, and answered his letters, giving him such advice and instruction as they thought he needed. His private tutor, also, Mr. S., was very kind and faithful in instructing him. When Thomas returned home in spring, he found his mother ill; but almost the first thing after kissing her, he began to tell her about his anxiety for his soul. Religion was the uppermost in his mind. It was the earnest desire of his parents that he might be led to the Savior; they prayed for him; and in addition to the instruction they could impart by signs and by writing, they placed religious books of a suitable kind in his hands; among others, that excellent book, Doddridge's RISE AND PROGRESS. Thomas was so much interested in this volume, that he spent nearly a whole week in carefully reading it. He would take it with him to his little apartment, and hardly allow himself time enough for his meals and necessary exercise. It seems to have been remarkably blessed to him in teaching him the way of salvation. When he had finished the volume, he went to his mother and thanked her for the book, and in his own expressive manner, (laying his hand upon his breast,) told her that the burden which had weighed him down was gone—that he now felt happy, and thought he loved Jesus. From that period there was a great change in Thomas. He never afterwards was known to disobey his parents; he earnestly desired that his brothers and sisters might become Christians; he spent much time in reading the Bible and religious books; he had a little chamber, in a retired part of the house, to which he was in the daily habit of going to pray to God; and he was very strict in observing the Sabbath. I do not mean that Thomas had no faults; he doubtless had many. He had formerly been much addicted to sudden fits of anger; and it cost him no small struggle to acquire self-control. He would often come to his parents and express great grief, that, when his little brothers got his knife or some article that belonged to him, and lost or misplaced it, he felt so impatient, and so much disposed to be angry; but would add by his emphatic signs, that he "put it down;" that is, he had controlled his temper.

But, my young friends, Thomas is now dead. Little did I think, a few weeks ago, when I spent a few moments in conversation with him, I should so soon be called to attend his funeral. Yes—he sleeps in the grave—the damp, cold grave. He faded and withered with the autumn flowers, and their melancholy winds are now sighing out the requiem over his tomb. His disease was violent, and soon did its work. I visited him, and he tried to make me understand that he was very sick, and thought he should die. I can never forget his manner and the expression of his countenance. He felt grieved that his disease was of such a nature that he could not be permitted to read the Bible—that precious book he had loved so much. And when his father would sit down by his bed-side, and spell out with his fingers some of his favorite passages, his countenance, though his poor body was racked with pain, expressed by smiles his inward satisfaction and joy. During a part of his sickness, he seemed to be deprived of those consoling views of the Savior which he had been accustomed to enjoy; but at length the clouds rolled away, he was perfectly resigned to the will of God, and believed that his spirit would go to the arms of his Savior.

Thomas hears now. The ear that never listened to the gospel or the songs of Zion on earth, now listens to the wonders of Redemption recounted in the new song; and the voice that was never fashioned to the language of praise and prayer, now mingles in sweetest harmony, in the choral hallelujahs of the heavenly world. His body rests in the grave; and when the snows of winter fall, they will cover and whiten the sod that presses heavily upon his throbless bosom; and when the birds of another spring return from tropical regions, they will come and sing in the branches of the evergreen that casts its shade over the cherished spot. The words of the poet, as applied to him, are susceptible of a literal interpretation.

"Receive my clay, thou treasurer of death!
I will no more demand my tongue,
'Till the gross organ, well refined,
Shall trace the boundless flights of an unfettered mind,
And raise an equal song." DR. WATTS.

My dear young friends, do you love the Saviour? Do you love to pray? "In attending upon the secret duties of religion, Thomas was an example to all of us," said his father. Do you love the Sabbath and keep it holy? Thomas was very strict in the observance of this day. Do you love to read the Bible? It was the delight of Thomas. Could you visit his little apartment, now vacant and deserted, you might see on his table among other books, his BIBLE, a present from his father, the gilt worn off from the leaves by much use—a leaf turned down here, and a leaf there, all giving evidence how much he read the Bible.

Are you still living without religion, without repenting of sin and loving the Saviour? How the example of Thomas condemns you! You can hear and speak; he could not. You can go to church and hear the gospel preached; he could not—"He will rise up in the judgment and condemn you, unless you repent. Seek the Lord now. Now is the accepted time."—"They that seek me early shall find me."—Do not put religion off. You may die suddenly. Ere spring returns, and earth puts on her vernal array of flowers and verdure, you may be mouldering in the cold and silent grave.

Your affectionate friend,
JAMES M. MACDONALD.

For the Register.

ON THE STRUCTURE AND USE OF THE EYE.

The Eye is the most perfect instrument that we know of: it is perhaps at the same time the most delicate. The human eye, though truly wonderful, may seem less so, than the eyes of certain insects, on account of their extreme minuteness.

The ant is believed to have fifty eyes; the beetle three thousand, the silk-worm moth six thousand, the dragon-fly twelve thousand; and some to have as many as twenty thousand; and every one of them a good-seeing eye!

But the present object is to speak particularly of the human eye. The little round thing in the middle of the eye is called the pupil. It has three coats around it; and between each two coats there is a thin fluid. The outside covering of the eye is what we call the white of the eye. To this are fastened the muscles by which the eye moves. Over the middle covering is a very dark paint. We sometimes, though rarely, see a person with reddish eyes; in these, the paint is light-colored. The third, or under covering, is merely the widening out of the nerve that leads from the eye to the brain, and is called the retina. The use of these coats, and the fluids between them, is to receive and arrange the rays of light.

The use of the lid is to moisten the eye, and, every time we wink, to wash off the dust that may have collected on the eye.

It may be remarked, that a knowledge of the structure of the eye was what gave rise to the invention of the telescope.

It is supposed that every thing we see, is for a time painted on the retina. And we know that when we look into another's eye, we see our image, as we do on looking into a mirror.

It sometimes happens that one eye has an oblique vision; or, in other words, that one eye looks partly side-wise. The remedy for this, according to Mrs. Taylor's Physiology, is to blindfold the well eye, and bring the other into use, which is generally weak; and by this means it is improved.

When a person's eye is too round, he is near-sighted. This is the case with fishes; their eyes are as round as a bullet. As we grow older, the eyes flatten. So that a person who is near-sighted when young, can see at a great distance when old. But he who sees well when young, will generally be inclined, when getting aged, to hold a book at a great distance from the sight. The cause of this flattening of the eyes is believed to be, that their fluids, in common with other parts of the system, have considerably dried away.

Now there is a way to prevent, in a good degree, this flattening of the eyes; it is simply this:—When you rise in the morning, dip the face and eyes into some pure, cold water. Perhaps river-water is as good as any, if we can obtain it free from salt and acid: that constituting what we call soft water.

Dr. H. Rogers, of Colchester, Ct., assured me that the above remedy was an excellent preservative of the sight. He had himself practiced bathing the eyes in cold water, though he had not commonly immersed them: and though about sixty years of age he had never, if I recollect, used glasses.

The above mentioned method of dipping the eyes is said to be recommended by a German.

I could mention the cases of two individuals, whose sight had for some time required spectacles, but after using the above prescriptive for a few months, their sight was so far recovered that their spectacles were no longer needed.

Sudden changes from darkness to light are believed to be highly prejudicial to the eye. Who does not know, that if we read by twilight as long as we can, and then strongly light the room, that we feel for a time severe pain in the eyes? This is because the pupil dilates in the dark, is somewhat injured by straining, and suddenly contracts on the admission of light.

Perhaps some who will read this article, may not have observed how much larger the pupil of the eye is before [illegible] and in the evening, than it is in the bright daylight. Many elderly people seem never to have noticed this. The writer had not observed it till a few years since, one of his eyes was seriously wounded. While it was valetudinary, he frequently looked into a mirror, and was surprised to discover, that early and late, the pupil of the injured eye was about the size of that in the well one, but during the very light part of the day the pupil of the well eye was much the smallest. This was because the injured one could not obey the laws of light, which required the pupil to contract in proportion to the amount of light.

Dr. Alcott believes that a large proportion of the weak eyes discoverable among children, were made so by injudicious treatment, perhaps at a very early period. And it is remarked by Dr. Reynolds that it is highly improper on awakening to go suddenly into a place where there is a bright light. He states that ophthalmy has been brought on in some instances, by sleeping till the sun shone brightly into the room; and that one such case terminated in total blindness. He justly observes that the fowls seem to be more wise in this respect than many people are. For the former are not only awake, but are on the move, some time before the sun makes his appearance; while the latter, especially in summer, often sleep till long after sun-rise.

In regard to the use of glasses, it may be remarked that Dr. A., and many others condemn their use, except to the long-sighted. He also disapproves the using of shades, except to such eyes as are deficient in lashers. And instead of shades he proposes that we read with the back to the light, having it shine from above and just back of the shoulders. It will readily be seen that in this position the sight must dilate; while the greatest amount of light is admitted on the book; and this prevents the necessity of straining the eyes.

If we must face a bright light, a shade for the eyes does well, if it constantly shade them. But we sometimes need to look up, and then the rays of light strike the eyes, so that the pupils contract at once: this must injure them. Another practice of which Dr. R. complains, is, that of making too much use of eye-water. He says "we ought never to use a stronger collyrium, than good river-water without the advice of a careful well-informed physician." In support of this idea, he relates an anecdote of a family in Paris, who made a fortune by the sale of eye-water, which became celebrated, but which proved to be the water of the Seine! The kindling of a morning fire, especially if it blaze suddenly, is to weak eyes a severe trial.

The last mentioned writer further observes, that the eyes should never be heated. He admits however that when they are diseased it may sometimes be advisable to wash them in water a little warmed. Indeed he mentions one case in which ophthalmy was relieved by washing the eyes in very warm water. As a general rule that temperature of water which is most agreeable to diseased eyes, is the one which he would recommend. But when they are well let them be dipped each morning in soft cold water—let the individual be temperate in diet—let him retire early—get a sufficient amount of sleep, and be up by the coming on of daylight—in short let him attend to the above rules—violate none of Nature's laws, and to say the least the eyes that are now strong and healthy may long be preserved. And as the American Solomon says, "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." G. P. M.

EVENING SONG OF THE WEARY.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

Father of Heaven and Earth!
I bless thee for the night,
The soft, still night!
The holy pause of care and mirth,
Of sound and light!

Now far in glade and dell,
Flower-cup, and bud, and bell,
Have shut around the sleeping woodlark's nest—
The bee's long murmuring toils are done,
And I, the o'erwearied one,
O'erwearied and o'erwrought,
Bless thee, O God, O Father of the oppressed,
With my last waking thought,
In the still night!

Yes, ere I sing to rest,
By the fire's dying light,
Thou Lord of Earth and Heaven!
I bless thee, who hast given,
Unto life's fainting travelers, the night,
The soft, still, holy night!

OH! DROOP THOU NOT!

They sin who tell us love can die.
With life all other passions fly;
All others are but vanity.
In heaven ambition cannot dwell,
Nor avarice in the vaults of hell;
Earthly these passions, as of earth—
They perish where they drew their birth.
But love is indestructibe!
Its holy flame for ever burneth;
From heaven it came to heaven returneth.

SOUTHEY.

RELIGIOUS.

From the N. Y. Evangelist

"Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on earth?"

BR. JOHNSON.—I do not recollect ever to have heard this remarkable monition of our Lord preached from or in any way made the subject of comment or remark. This may have been; and therefore not an illustration of what seems intimated in the words, to wit:—that those to whom it applies, will slumber over their lack of faith, nor institute any self-searching inquiries, agreeably to the spirit of the warning given.

We live in an age abounding with opinions and hopes concerning the coming of the Son of Man, and not a few unequivocal tokens of that approaching event. In this respect, we are reminded of the days preceding the incarnation of our Lord. It is in our eyes remarkable that the bursting forth of so many events from the womb of prophecy, and the multiplication of signs and wonders, combined with the moral influence of our Lord's character and doctrine, did not awaken the men of that generation, that they should not have been guilty of his kingdom because of their unbelief.

But what if Christendom, in this day, were alike guilty and ill-fated? The enquiry as to how far this may be so, is certainly not out of place. Nothing, we are sure, is more an object of concern with the arch-enemy of Christ's kingdom, than to unfit the greatest possible number to 'abide the day of his coming' and to 'stand when he appeareth.' We know also, that only such as are 'ready' will enter with the bridegroom into the marriage, and that against the rest the door will be irreversibly shut.

Satan will have his malignant desires just so far as he can despoil the nominal 'children of the kingdom' of their characteristic qualification, which is faith working by love, disposition of mind to approve and embrace the distinctive features of the kingdom, whenever, and howsoever exhibited, and especially all its 'little ones,' according to the final comprehensive law of the house.

Is this work of spoliation now going on, and the text developing its own meaning, and implicating us in its condemnation?

We believe that the long delayed petitions of the holy kings and prophets, are about being called up to their fulfilment. The arm of the Lord is awaking. Moral causes are evolving their energy with rapidity and results heretofore unknown, and in some respects unthought of; nor has the half been told of the potency of truth, which forthcoming history will unfold. The nations are shaken by causes unseen. The wise are taken in their own craftiness. The day of the Lord is 'upon every high tower, and upon every fenced wall, and upon all pleasant pictures;' and some glimpses begin to appear of the mode of the Divine operation, in the final establishment of the Redeemer's kingdom in the earth. But, of all the affecting particulars which justify this remark: what is the correspondent character of our faith? We look back a century or two, and find the Howes and Baxters, the Edwards and Brainerds of the church, clinging fast to the bare promises of God, and laboring with a zeal unsurpassed in any age; and it is affecting to see them sometimes following their Lord, amazed and sorrowful, wondering at the long deadness of the nations, looking in vain for some door of hope in the broad repulsive walls of Satan's empire; and again reverting to the sure word of prophecy, if peradventure it had not been rightly read, closing all with the heartfelt expostulation, "O Lord how long!" Their's was a wintry age, when any but a vigorous faith was liable to surmise that God had forsaken the earth. The 'everlasting covenant, ordered in all things, and sure,' was all their salvation, and all their desire; although he made it not to grow. The prophecies to them were like leafless trunks; and their prayers and tears, like seeds embedded in the clods. They had not yet put forth the green foliage of Summer, nor the waving white of harvest. With what emotions would they have witnessed the events of our day: the world opening as the field before Christian intelligence and enterprise—the prostration of heathen idolatry—the tottering of time-honored superstition—the incipient conversion of the abundance of the seas—the thousands of India and the ten thousands of the Ocean Isles, like nations born in a day. With what public and private acknowledgments would they have come before God, and with what renewed devotion would they have testified their faith and feeling. How they would have girded on the gospel armor, and put the trump of battle to their lips, while under the banners of the Lord of Hosts they went forth crying, "that thy way may be known upon the earth, thy saving health among all nations." That there are those who duly estimate these times, and are giving themselves with a corresponding zeal to their Master's work, we would by no means be understood to deny. God has his elect, who cry day and night unto him. They are faithful and wise servants, whom their Lord, at his coming, will find duly employed. But there are many besides that slumber as if the night were yet at the deadest, and the Bridegroom's delay unbroken. What means the fewness of our monthly and annual concerts—what the so extensive falling in of the church, with the world's interpretation of the abundant multiplication of the means of wealth and influence—what the controlling sway of carnal principles and motives, over their opinions and pursuits? Is there not here a widening departure from the constituent elements of the heavenly kingdom. Is not here the race-ground, where many run, and self the goal. Who of these are duly consecrating themselves, and their means and possessions, to the building of the Lord's house? Is this the faith that overcometh the world? when the Son of Man cometh will he find it here?

Again: am I mistaken in supposing that faith in the providence of God, is at low ebb, and meets a just rebuke from ages gone by. Where is the filial reference of personal concernments to the disposal of divine superintendence, that distinguished Welch and Bunyan, and Newton, and Tennent? The paternal care of heaven is not honored as it deserves. Christians resort to men and money, and means, and management, and patronage, and policy; and thus involve themselves in perplexity, and their lives are worn out amid distractions, which exclude the seeking first the kingdom of God, if they do not the seeking it at all and hinder, if they do not destroy some of the holiest and happiest influences of domestic and social life. In the mean time, many a snare, diverse, foolish and hurtful lusts, and much of the sorrow of the world that worketh death, bear witness, that these are perverse and forbidden paths. To seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, amid the multiplying facilities for the acquisition of wealth and distinction, is a sentiment nearly obsolete.—Simplicity, contentedness, practical reliance on God, humility, deadness to carnal and worldly objects, the quiet pursuit of an honest calling, and a conscience void of offence, are not in vogue. It is regarded but as decent, that they should retire in favor of the march of intellect, and the advance of modern improvement. If they exist, they are passed in silence amid the applauses of noisier themes. It is true they are allowed to be good and desirable, because it cannot be denied; like certain commodities in trade, which, though of intrinsic worth, have become unmarketable, so that it is an impertinence to cry them up. Yet these unobtrusive virtues are so essentially of the nature of faith, that in the proportion of their absence alarm ought to be awakened, as to the import of this interrogation; for in no age have the tokens been so frequent and affecting, of the Lord's tabernacling among men, and of the active particularity of his providence which ruleth over all.

What shall we learn as to the prevalence of faith in its genuine nature, from the character and consequences of the controversial spirit that prevails? How far may it be characterised as speaking the truth in love? And how far are its fruits in goodness, and righteousness and truth? Does our controversy, on the whole, exhibit traits of the faithful and wise steward, whose studies are directed to make a right dispensation of the mysteries of the kingdom of Heaven; or of that wicked servant, who reposing in the presumptive delay of his master, usurps a violent dominion over his fellows, and seeks the occasions of carnal and worldly rejoicing? We must conclude that the appropriate faith which receives the kingdom, and qualifies for his enjoyment, is rather eminent for the gentler virtues, and particularly for love of the brethren. Though manly in its clear apprehensions of truth, and its adherence to it, yet in respect to all malicious affections, it is childlike. Whomsoever Christ approves, it receives to the glory of God.—This, doubtless, is the faith which corresponds to the nature of Christ's kingdom, and is indispensable to a share in its blessedness. The law of enfranchisement is, "whosoever receiveth not the kingdom of Heaven as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein." When therefore the Son of Man cometh, such only as are thus qualified, can we suppose ready to welcome his arrival. As to others, notwithstanding the teachings and doings with which they have been familiar, as spectators, or nominal disciples, we must conclude he will disown all relationship to them. Should the Lord come suddenly to his temple, and apply, as the exclusive rule of admission to his glory, the possession of such a temper as accords with the nature of his kingdom, and gladly embraces in undissembled love all its members; are there none, or but a few, who would be sadly surprised in a state of actual unreadiness? Would all injuries be forgiven, and all injurious dispositions repented of, according to the explicit requisition of the Master? Would there be no confusion—no dismay in the sacramental hosts?—no consternation like that which seized the presumptuous servant? In view of such a horrid predicament, ought not the prayer of the Apostles suggested by similar considerations, to urge itself to our lips: "Lord, increase our faith." For all qualifiations are nugatory, which come short of faith which worketh by love.

Once more: the want of sympathy with the travail of the militant church. The blood of its martyrs still unavenged, and the will of its glorious Head still unaccomplished. There can be no doubt, if the feelings, prayers, and exertions of the church as a mass, should take a right direction, and fall without being impaired or divided, upon the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom, that great and unheard of results would accrue. It must be equally plain, that if the engagedness of numbers about the things after which the Gentiles seek, is the true index of their minds they are not prepared to enter with the bridegroom into the marriage, or share any happy part in the triumph of the Christian cause. After all that can with propriety be said for the encouragement of the arts, the improvement of the facilities of the age, and the wise and thankful use of the bounties of Providence, and all that may be urged against monarchism, fanaticism, and will-worship, is there not still an engrossment of heart and mind in the things that are in the world, a conformity to its pursuits and fashions, its maxims and phraseology, which occasions sad ruminations in connection with the injunction, "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world; if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him;" and imaginings of those that are saved, yet so as by fire, of brands plucked of the burning, and of camels going through a needle's eye. We feel authorised at least to say, that if style and equippage, speculations and hazardous investments, absorb about all, more or less, above the requirements of honest living; if the prevailing tendency of this surplus bears an inverse relation to the standing rule, to "seek first the kingdom," then must we abide by the inference, "that where the treasure is, there the heart will be also." And this is just the predicament most to be dreaded, that the sympathies are enticed away after alien objects, while the cause of a suffering church, and a perishing race, are passed by on the other side. We are the more incited to candid self-scrutiny in this respect, by the touching expostulations which sometimes reach us, from our brethren in the high places of the field. If we felt as they do, and were "grieved for the affliction of Joseph," should we not speedily invert our rule in this particular, and give our secular affairs an obviously new arrangement, in reference to their ultimate object. And dare we be content, unless conscious of so much sympathy with them, and of such a kind, as to give our Lord's rule the practical ascendancy. The truth is, there are very many things that are in the world, to which the members of the church may be conformed without suspicion, and these are the most decent and refined forms of worldliness; and they are enough, without the more glaring and demonstrable ones, to engross a worldly mind, especially one that has been modified by the nurture and communion of the church. On the other hand, there are decisive traits of discipleship which may be inoperative or absent, and yet uncensured. They are not thought indispensable to a credible profession. Hence the danger in this quarter becomes apparent to all who are conversant with the elements of the human heart, and of the world. And who can deny the probable implication of numbers in this condemnation. Our fears are rather authorised by the opposite exhibition of character, distinctly and appropriately Christian, in the midst of the common danger, affording evidence above surmise, of supreme devotedness to the supreme object. There are those, and the writer has not to search for an example, who daily tread the busiest and most lucrative paths of commercial enterprise, liable to the smiling allurements and the obsequious flatteries that wait on the prosperous, and yet sit in the native simplicity of Christ's little children at the feet of their Lord, and go about with a hearty love doing good; whose style and expenditures of living, have neither waxed or waned with the changing times; who have contributed their surplus in frequent and effective donations to the worthiest plans of beneficence, and have found in forwarding the Redeemer's interests, the delight which others have sought in sacrificing to the opinions of the world.

If our conjectures are well founded, we are led to inquire in conclusion, what must be the consequence of such a fearful delinquency, at the coming of the Lord? Dreadful criminality, it certainly implies. Its guilt can scarcely lack any aggravation. It supposes a departure from duty, based on the primary error of the wicked servant, "my Lord delayeth his coming!" How can we avoid the conviction that the doom of hypocrites and unbelievers will be theirs, and the children of the kingdom give place to the strangers from the four quarters of the globe. Who can tell but God will find reasons for converting by millions the still darkened heathen, and fill the earth with the glory of their return to himself, while no considerations in the divine counsels, will permit the longer delay of vengeance upon the long hardened despisers of gospel light. Many a decimation, we fear, must pass over the church, ere her integral body shall attain the stature of a perfect man in Christ Jesus, or all her members bear the decisive marks of regenerate conformity to their Head. It is no argument against fears and suggestions like these, that they are extensively regarded as uncalled for; for, as we understand the sure word of prophecy, the church are not excluded from the application of that warning, "when they shall say, peace and safety, then sudden destruction," with surprising and inevitable throes, shall come on all the dwellers of the earth, and that what our Lord said to the disciples of his own day, he said unto all, "Watch."

THE BIBLE.

"A nation must be truly blessed, if it were governed by no other laws than those of this blessed book; it is so complete a system that nothing can be added or taken from it; it contains every thing needful to be known or done; it affords a copy for a king, and a rule for a subject; it gives instruction and counsel to a senate authority and direction to a magistrate; it cautions a witness, requires an impartial verdict of a jury, and furnishes a judge with his sentences; it sets the husband as lord of the household and wife as mistress of the table; tells him how to rule, and her to manage; it entails honor to parents, and enjoins obedience upon children; it prescribes and limits the sway of sovereigns, the rule of rulers, and the authority of masters; commands the subjects to honor, and the servants to obey; and promises the protection of its author to all who walk in its rules. It gives directions for weddings and burials; it promises food and raiment; it points out a faithful and eternal guardian to the departing husband and father; tells him with whom to leave his fatherless children, and in whom his widow is to trust; and promises a father to the former, and husband to the latter. It teaches a man how he ought to set his house in order, and how to make his will; appoints a dowry for his wife, and entails the right of the first born; and shows how the younger branches shall be left. It defends the rights of all, and reveals vengeance to the defrauder, over-reacher, oppressor. It is the first book, and the oldest book in the world. It contains the choicest matter, gives the best instruction, and affords the greatest pleasure and satisfaction, that ever were revealed. It contains the best law, and profoundest mysteries, that ever were penned. It brings the best tidings, and affords the best comfort, to the inquiring and disconsolate. It exhibits life, and immortality, and shows the way to everlasting glory. It is a brief recital of all that is past, and a certain prediction of all that is to come. It reveals the only living and true GOD, and shows the way to him; and sets aside all gods, and describes the vanity of them and all that put their trust in them."

FOR THE CHILDREN.

LITTLE WILLY.

* * "My little Willy was born Nov. 17th, 1829. I received him as a precious gift from my Heavenly Father,—as an immortal soul committed to my charge, and I felt that if I nursed him for God, he would pay me my wages. With the earliest dawn of his reason, I endeavored and delighted to associate the loveliness and beauty of holiness. I felt so much the importance of maternal influence and watchfulness on the mind and character, that I considered that hour a lost one in which he was not under my own notice. How earnestly I wish mothers would think more of this! Early impressions being the most abiding, must be the most important. His little forms of morning and evening prayer were always rendered seasons of peculiar interest, because I never allowed them to pass without my particular attention; and now with what mingled emotions do I often dwell on the review of those periods of spiritual intercourse. My darling child always slept in a cot in my own room: around the space which it occupied I used to place pictures of Scripture history, on purpose to attract his attention on waking, to elicit questions, and to afford subjects for his infant thoughts when gazing on them: and sweet have been the moments we have thus passed together, because they afforded such pleasing and easy opportunities of imparting instruction. He never closed his eyes to sleep, or awoke in the morning, without repeating a text of scripture. From the adoption of this plan he acquired much Scripture knowledge, long before he could read; indeed, his mind was very familiar with most of the histories of the Old and New Testaments, in consequence of the deep attention he always paid to my reading them. I seldom remember closing the Bible on such occasions without his pleading entreaties to read more. All those means, without the blessing of God being sought and resting upon them, I knew would be unavailing; but I was always sweetly encouraged by the command and promise, "train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old he will not depart from it." I had a precious refuge in prayer; for God alone could impart the assistance I needed in training this loved one for eternity: and truly can I say, my sweetest moments were passed in attracting him to that kind shepherd who has now "gathered him in his arms and carried him in his bosom."

* * * * *

I cannot refer to any particular period, when I think the power of regenerating grace passed upon the mind and feelings of my dear child. His life and conduct abundantly testified that he was under Divine influence, and that his mind was expanding for eternity. He was usually in the full vigor of health; and had a happier flow of spirits than I ever beheld in a child. Still, he would leave sports and plays in which he delighted, for the still sweeter pleasure of hearing the Scriptures read and explained.

* * * * *

Ah! how very often do I weep for the absence of that lovely kindness which at all times influenced him, not only to meet, but to anticipate my wishes: his little hands and feet were so unweariedly swift and willing at all times, whatever was his engagement, to obey and serve me. This was an habitual feeling, and deep and real would be his anguish of mind if he thought I could be displeased with him. I can never forget his interesting conduct on that occasion, when about five years old. Some persons were conversing with me on a subject which he knew occasioned anxiety on my part: his sympathising bosom immediately caught the feelings, to conceal which in their presence he softly crept under the table. When they had left the room, he quickly sprang from his retreat, and with a look so descriptive of affection, he said, "Mamma you are in great trouble; but you must look to God." Another time, seeing me anxious and unable to conceal the starting tear, (which I could seldom do from his quick perception,) he cheerfully said,—"Now then, let us get the Bible, mamma; that always comforts you." He was truly my little helper in Divine things, often elevating my thoughts and feelings to the true and only source of comfort. The importance of improving time my dearest Willy deeply felt, considering it a talent for which we must give an account; and if only waiting a few moments for some employment, he would anxiously say, "Now, mamma, I have nothing to do; I am on Satan's ground, you know." I always considered it a very important part of infant education, to keep them continually employed. I remember being much struck with this valuable remark of Mrs. Hannah More, "Idleness among children, as amongst men, is the root of all evil, and leads to no evil more certainly than to ill temper.

* * * * * *

Soon after he had entered his fifth year, I remember his starting up in his little bed, and with much earnestness saying, "Mamma, I am not afraid to die." "Why not, my dear?" "Because Jesus Christ came into the world to take away our sins, and I know mine are forgiven through his precious blood." With what adorning gratitude did I raise my heart to God, believing that he was then sealed an heir of Glory. He knew and felt himself a sinner, and that the way of salvation was through the atonement of Christ. I did not rely on occasional remarks and expressions from such infant lips, but my consolation arose from the daily and hourly evidence I had of the influence of religion on all the words and actions of this little disciple of Christ.

* * * * * *

Just as my darling had entered his sixth year, arrangements were made for our going abroad, the anticipation of which, and the prospects of the voyage itself, often occasioned an intense anxiety in my own mind and feelings.* And here I shall fail in attempting to do justice to the conduct and piety of my child, it so surpassed his years. Some weeks before we sailed, he evinced much thoughtful anxiety on my account. I remember his selecting that beautiful hymn, "The Lord will provide," as being so appropriate to my circumstances, and he would express peculiar delight if I appeared comforted by the following verse:

"We may, like the ships,
By temptest be tost,
On perilous deeps,
But cannot be lost," &c.

And the last two lines of this beautiful hymn, were often sounded in my ears, by his little voice so happily singing "I hope to die shouting, The Lord will provide."—The dear child learned much Scripture and many hymns during the voyage. The following was his particular favorite, and he seldom closed his eyes without repeating it.

"Lord look upon a sinful child,
By nature sinful, rude, and wild,
O put thy gracious hands on me,
And make me all I ought to be.

"Make me thy child, a child of God,
Washed in my Savior's precious blood,
And my whole soul from sin set free,
A little vessel full of Thee.

"O Jesus, take me to thy breast,
And bless me, that I may be blest;
Both when I wake and when I sleep,
Thy little lamb in safety keep."

* * * * * *

Only a week before his death, I enjoyed a lovely walk while he sported by my side, and then climbed the mountain top in the highest flow of spirits. On returning home we had an interesting conversation on the subject of Peter denying Christ. Could I have thought that had been our last earthly week! but my Heavenly Father knew. On the next day week, I saw my child motionless and dead! The dear lamb only complained of headache, and appeared languid. Still our fears were excited; and before the day dawn of a tropical climate, his devoted father walked the distance of four or five miles to procure medical advice; but so insidious was death in its approach, that, up to the evening that we were called to bid the final and agonising adieu to this object of our tenderest affection, he was pronounced almost well. But in the same night inflammation of the brain came on so rapidly, that, though we had the advice of three medical men, and all the means were resorted to that could be suggested, they proved ineffectual.

* * * * * *

A few hours before his release, after looking sweetly on me for some minutes he said, "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want;" and then, with his face towards his pillow, distinctly sung,

"Oh, that will be joyful, joyful, joyful,
When we meet to part no more."

Thinking of his little brother, to whom he often repeated the following verse, he again sung,

"Little boy, with cheerful eye;
Bright and blue as yonder sky,
Come and learn betimes to love,
That great God who reigns above."

Then raising his eye heavenward, and waving his little hand, he said, "God is every where, mamma, managing all the worlds!" His attitude, his looks, his beautiful elevated thoughts and feelings, now convinced me that his soul would soon soar to the regions for which it was prepared. With a heart overflowing with unutterable grief, I then said, would you rather die, my precious, or get well again? With a decided voice and emphasis he replied, "I would rather die; because if I am a Christian, I shall go to Heaven and be far happier." Then, with both his arms clasping my neck, he earnestly said, "take me home, mamma, take me home. You must come, and Louisa must come too." His own happy spirit was on the wing for eternal joys, of which he evidently wished us to partake. This was the sweetly sacred, solemn, closing scene of earthly intercourse.

FOR THE IMPENITENT.

THE DYING FORMALIST.

While many perish without even the form of godliness, others perish by resting satisfied with its form, though strangers to its power. A Christian writer furnishes the following narrative:

"I was, sometime ago, called to visit a poor man on his death-bed, who had long been in the habit of attending the house of God with regularity, and apparently with great attention. I found him very near his end. Disease had reduced his strength, and emaciated his once-athletic frame. I entered without delay on the great subject of my visit.

'How, long, my friend, have you been in the habit of attending, the worship of God?' 'Thirty years, Sir.'

'And have you ever felt the reality and importance of religion, on the services of which you have attended?' With a look which seemed to indicate the feelings of despair, he answered in a tone of the utmost earnestness, 'No!'

'What, can it indeed be possible, that you have been favored with the devotional services, and the holy instructions of God's house for thirty years, and never felt that religion was true or necessary?'

'Ah! Sir, mine has been my neglect of the service of God. I will give you my history:—

'My father and mother were free from the grosser vices of the world, and regularly attended their church; when I was apprenticed far from home, they charged me never to neglect a place of worship, and I have kept the promise I made them, that I never would: but I now find that all my outward attendance on the public duties of religion has done me no good.'

'How so?'

'O! Sir, I supposed that I had nothing more to do than to present myself before God, and appear in the act of worship. I never felt that I was a sinner, and that the curse of God rested upon me; that therefore I ought to humble myself before him, and seek for his mercy through our Lord Jesus Christ; but now I feel I am going to die, and I am sure that such a religion as this cannot take me to heaven. My conscience does not reproach me with neglecting my duties to my fellow creatures; but, Oh! I have sinned against God! I forgot, what I now feel, that He looks at the state of the heart, and that we cannot worship Him if that is not engaged. I have no hope! I have no hope!'

'But there is hope in Jesus,' said I, 'for the very vilest of sinners.'

'But Sir, I have insulted God by solemn mockery. I have professed to hear his word, but I know nothing of it; I professed to pray, but never did so in reality. My neighbors, I dare say, took me for a Christian, but the great Searcher of hearts knows I have been a hypocrite. Sir, I have no hope of happiness after death!'

'Truly the case was an awful one, but I felt my duty to be to direct the sufferer at once to Him who has promised to cast out none who come to him; his reply was indeed emphatic, Sir, I have despised his counsel, and would none of his reproof.—I must be lost!—

'Yet still believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.'

'I have heard that passage of Scripture,' said he 'repeated scores of times, but it does not now belong to me: God will not always be trifled with; I have abused every opportunity of obtaining salvation for thirty years, and now He has left me to take the consequence of my sins.'

'Reader, how is it with you, in reference to your attendance on the ordinances of God's house, and the improvement you derive from them? It is too commonly the case, that many of those who attend on the ministry of the gospel, of every denomination, neither understand its nature, nor feel its importance. Is it so with you? In a little time you must stand at the bar of your great Judge, and render an account of the privileges you have enjoyed, and the improvement you have made of them."

O! improve those privileges, which once gone, are gone forever!

It is impossible to know our justification except in our obedience to Christ. And to obey Christ or hope for justification through him, unless he were God over all would be indeed blasphemous.—Howel's Remains.

Christ Jesus is great in every respect; finite beings are only great in some things when compared with each other, and when compared with God they are little in every respect.—Ibid.

Exemption from mistake is not the privilege of mortals. But when our mistakes are involuntary, we owe each other every candid consideration; and the man who on discovering his errors, acknowledges and corrects them, is scarcely less entitled to our esteem than if he had not erred.—Pye Smith.

There are few occasions in life in which we are more called upon to watch ourselves narrowly, and to resist the assaults of various temptations, than in conversation.—H. More.

The Bible seeketh not its defenders from those who give it a blind and uncandid approval, but from those who prize it for its native worth.

MISSIONARY GLEANINGS.

THE JEWS AND PALESTINE.—Dr. Bowring says that he beheld with great emotion the undying love of the Jews for the land of the prophets. Many weary pilgrims had sunk and died with emotion, on visiting the walls of Salem. Many have perished in the pilgrimage from exhaustion.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.—Letters from Mr. Armstrong state, that 10,000 children in the islands are capable of reading and profiting by printed Bibles.

RETURN OF THE JEWS.—It was the opinion of Dr. Dwight, that the Jews would literally return to Judea, and afterwards be converted to Christianity.

CEYLON MISSION.—Mr. Ward thinks that a great change is coming over the minds of the people on the subject of religion. They read much, and are changing their views perceptibly on important points.

PROSPECTIVE WAR WITH BURMAH.—Rev. H. Howard writes, that unless the difficulties between Burmah and Britain are settled in two months, a decisive blow will be struck.

Rev. Cephas Bennet, his wife, and four children who have been connected for several years with the Mission in Burmah, have arrived in N. York, in the ship Champlain from Calcutta. By this arrival the account of the earthquake at Ava is confirmed. Every building and pagoda of brick was prostrated and many lives were lost by the calamity.

DEATH OF CHILDREN.

The recent decease of several children in this village, has caused the hearts of parents to bleed. On the morning of the 9th inst., three infant sons, in three different families, lay ready for the coffin. This was an uncommon occurrence for a country village. The united funeral of two at the sanctuary, was a solemn season.

When infants die, we have reason to believe that they are received to heaven; not on account of any native fitness for heaven, but through the merits of the Redeemer—their unholy hearts being renewed by the Holy Spirit, in a manner perfectly suited to God's own incomprehensible renovating agency. Here a solemn inquiry is suggested to the mind of the parent—it is this; Have I not children, who, if they should now be called to die, would not be safe?—Our little ones pass so imperceptibly from mere infancy to childhood, and from early to more advanced childhood, that we are not apt to notice their increasing accountability; hence we fail to realise their awful exposure to the "wrath to come." We must be cautious, that we do not transfer the belief which we cherish of the heavenly felicity of our children, should they die in infancy, to their impenitent days of childhood and youth. Let us look upon our group of young immortals, and inquire, are we doing all we can for their salvation? J. R. J.

THE JEWISH MISSION.

Friends of the Mission! has it then a foe
Amid Jehovah's ranks? Is there a heart
That does not vibrate with a quenchless love,
For the forsaken heritage of God,
Long made a bye-word for the taunting lip
Of bitter scorn? Who would withhold the plea
For Israel, at the throne of Israel's God?

Ye ask, "where is the token of his coming?
Show us a sign for good." And know ye not
That they are blest, who, seeing not, believe?
Ye say "the harvest is not fully ripe."
Well, be it so. "Faith hails the hour of toil.
And would ye reap what ye have never sown?
Would ye the sickle should forestall the seed?
Shall nature falter in its onward course?
The tide of grace roll backward to its fount?

We heard the cry—"Come, let us rise, and build
The wasted walls." And we did trust to see,
(With Heaven's high blessing on the purpos'd toil)
"Each joined together, to the half thereof."
And does faith fail, and unbelief, so soon
Cry, as it curls the lip of bitter scorn,
"A noble fabric this!" If but a fox
Go up upon it, he shall even break
This wondrous structure! Think they to revive
The scatter'd fragments of the heaps consumed?"

But wherefore triumph? Has the treasury
Been fill'd with goodly gifts, with offerings
Meet for the enterprise? Have they who wrought
Been guarded by their fellows, nobly bent
On the achievement? Has the trumpet's voice
Been lifted up, along the battlements,
And cry met cry, and shout, the answering shout,
'Till eye to eye the gathering watchmen stand
Strong for the conflict? Then fear not, the wall
Shall be rebuilt, and Judah shall rejoice.

But what means that premature appeal—
"Help, or the workmen fail!" And are there none
To stay the lab'ror's arm? none who would spring
Exulting, to the contest? None who would lay
Their little all upon the car that rolls
To certain victory? Faith, with upward eye,
Already hails the glimmer of that dawn
When the long scattered tribes of Jacob's house
Shall tread, rejoicing, their parental soil
And own MESSIAH, KING!

UBIQUITY OF GOD.

Among the perfections of Jehovah, none appear more wonderful to a reflecting mind than his omnipresence. How God can be every where at the same moment, is beyond our comprehension. Such knowledge, said David, "is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it." But that God is omnipresent we cannot doubt, since the nature of his existence, and the infinitely great and wonderful operations of the Supreme Creator and Ruler of the universe, require it.

He who hath made, upholds, and directs all things, must necessarily be present with all things, whether they be great or small, in heaven or earth. If we ascend into heaven, He is there. If we descend into the deep, He is there. If we take the wings of the morning, and with the speed of light, fly to the uttermost parts of the sea, thither his hand would guide us, and HE would uphold us there.

Intimately and essentially connected with this incomprehensible perfection of Jehovah, is his omniscience. He sees, hears, and knows all things. Not a sparrow falls to the ground without his notice. Not a sigh nor complaint is uttered by any of all the creatures he hath made, and with which the earth teems, but what is heard and remembered by him. Not an insect, however small, moves, nor leaf stirs in all the immense forests of the earth unnoticed, and unaided by him. But there are other worlds—worlds without number dispersed abroad over the vast dominion of Jehovah, which, like our own, are composed of atoms, and probably inhabited by myriads of living beings, which share alike the all-pervading presence of the great I AM.

How vast is the dominion of the Almighty! If we attempt to throw our thoughts across the universe of God, and enumerate the countless millions of worlds which are stationed in their appropriate places, or roll through infinite space; we find ourselves soon bewildered, and lost in the immensity of HIS works; and are led to exclaim, "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord, God, Almighty." But if we consider all these worlds to be inhabited by myriads of living beings, and not a sparrow among them all falls to the ground without our Heavenly Father's notice, our astonishment is increased, and we labor to find suitable terms to express our adoration.

"But O! our highest notes the theme debase,
And silence is our least injurious praise," while we——

"With silent duty meekly bend before him,
And deep within our inmost hearts adore him."

But to leave other worlds and other beings, let us turn our thoughts to the supervision of Jehovah over the affairs of intelligent beings—beings accountable to God for their moral doings. This grade in the vast scale of being do we hold, who at the beginning, were appointed lords of the earth, and made responsible to our Creator for our moral actions. God not only, therefore, takes cognizance of our natural but moral being. He is the searcher of hearts, and tryer of the reins of the children of men.—David said, "O Lord! thou hast searched me, and known me. Thou compassest my path, and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways. For there is not a word of my tongue but lo! O, Lord, thou knowest it altogether." God is not only round about us, but his spirit is within us. He who is to be our Judge is familiar with all the deep things of our hearts. Are we startled at this truth? and do we attempt to fly? Whither shall we go from his spirit? or whither shall we flee from his presence, since the eyes of the Lord are in every place? Why do not the guilty tremble in view of their situation, since their Sovereign and Judge lays his hand continually upon them, and investigates their every action and thought? Will a subject transgress the laws of his king in sight of the throne? Will a man wantonly and designedly incur the penalty of death in the presence of the executioner? He will not unless he is ignorant of the situation he occupies. Neither will a man transgress the laws of his God were he not ignorant of his situation. But of this he is willingly ignorant. Sinners may wish to put God from their thoughts, just as a man that is walking upon the verge of a dangerous precipice, would close his eyes that he might not be alarmed at his situation; and yet the precipice is there, and his danger is increased. So God is none the less with the guilty, and his situation is none the less alarming because he is enabled to cast off fear by putting God from his thoughts.—Should the king upon his throne—the legislator in the hall—the judge upon the bench—the lawyer at the bar—the juror in the box—the minister in the pulpit—the mechanic in the shop—the merchant in the counting room—the sailor upon the ocean, and the farmer at the plough,—should all men, every where, at all times, be suitably impressed with this solemn truth, "THOU, GOD, SEEST ME," with what scrupulous exactness would they attend to all their various duties? and how careful would they be to avoid all and every sin!

THE DE RUYTER INSTITUTE.

We call the attention of our readers this week to a notice of this Institution in our advertising columns. We presume no Institution of its grade in the State, affords better facilities for obtaining a classical education, than the De Ruyter Institute. It is provided with competent teachers in all the various branches named in the article above refered to. Any persons wishing to avail themselves of a thorough knowledge of the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, and Italian Languages, can be accommodated at the De Ruyter Institute. Those who wish to obtain a knowledge of the art of Drawing and Painting, on correct principles, and those who wish to qualify themselves for common-school teaching, will do well to attend this Institution.

The arrangement of the rooms in the building is well calculated to afford the student in his hours of study a pleasant and undisturbed quietness. The Recitation Rooms are pleasantly situated and agreeably furnished.

We have been much pleased with the regularity and good order with which all things appear to move within the walls of this spacious building.

We think Parents living at a distance, who send their children to this Institution, need labor under no fears relative to their morals; as no pains are spared by the Faculty to instil into the minds of those placed under their charge correct moral principles. And as it regards the community of De Ruyter, we are happy in believing that, in point of morality, it is transcended but by few if any.

Although De Ruyter may not vie with many places in its romantic scenery, yet we think that those who wish to breathe a pure air, and who can be delighted with a prospect of beautifully rounded hills and fertile vallies, will not find it very difficult for them to make it a home in De Ruyter.

MISSIONARY MINUTES.

The patrons of the A. S. D. B. Missionary Society were undoubtedly much disappointed in not receiving the Minutes of that Society, in connection with the Conference Minutes, as was by them anticipated.—Most of them are likely still ignorant of the cause. For the information of such we would say, that we are informed by brother John Davis, who was appointed to superintend their printing, that the copy which came into his hands was mislaid or lost, and therefore could not be published. We learn, however, that a portion of the original Minutes are preserved in the hands of the reviser, and as soon as they can be obtained will be published in the columns of the Register.

REVIVAL RECORD.

For a few months past, God has been pouring down the spirit of revival upon many of his Churches in different parts of our country. The joyful tidings are reaching us from the east, west, north and south. These manifestations of God's favor are not confined to any particular denomination, but various sects unite their efforts, and share alike the effusions of the holy spirit. The Editor of the N. Y. Evangelist, says:—"The revival in that city continues with deep and permanent interest. Great congregations continue to attend the preaching of ELDER KNAPP at the Baptist Tabernacle."

We extract the following items from a communication addressed to Elder A. CAMPBELL.

PRESTON, March 7.

"Our meeting closed a week ago to-day. Elder Swan labored with us (after you left) until it ended. The interest of the meeting continued to increase, during its continuance. About thirty, in all, have obtained a hope; and a large number more are anxiously seeking the salvation of their souls."

CLEAVELAND, OHIO.—There has been a powerful revival of religion in Cleaveland the present winter, which has extended through all classes of community. Men of almost all professions are embraced in the work. Many who were sceptical. Some open and avowed infidels have been prostrated by the spirit of God, and submitted to the terms of salvation. Hundreds have turned into the paths of salvation. The work continued at the last accounts.

IN PITTSBURG, PA, there is a powerful revival. There has not been so much religious feeling in the place for the last ten years as at present.

IN CINCINNATI, OHIO, a large number has recently embraced the Saviour, and a blessed revival is going forward.

IN ALBANY, N. Y. a gracious work has recently been enjoyed under the preaching of Mr. Knapp, the evangelist. Nearly one hundred have been baptized.

NILES, MICHIGAN.—A powerful revival is enjoyed in this place. The whole population are moved. An officer of the United States army, and several students are among the number. The work is widely extending.

NORTH ATTLEBOROUGH, MASS.—We are happy to learn from several sources, that an interesting work of grace is moving onward in this place.

SHELBURN FALLS.—About thirty have recently found hope in Christ.

CARROLLVILLE.—Never, says a letter, was there known such a state of things in this village, as now.

CHURCHES IN MAINE.—We learn from the Christian Mirror, that there is much interest in some of the churches. The feeling of expectation is extensive.

GREAT FALLS VILLAGE.—Infidels and Universalists are bowing before the Lord. They are burning their evil books. 350 persons are supposed to have entertained hope of eternal life. A religous influence pervades the whole people.

BARDSTOWN AND SPRINGFIELD, KY.—These places are said to be greatly blessed with spiritual refreshings.

PROVIDENCE AND NEWTON, PA.—One hundred years ago, this part of Montgomery Co. was the scene of Whitfield's labors. The God of Whitfield is now pouring out his spirit gloriously upon the churches.

YORK, PA.—Lutherans, German reformed, and Presbyterians are UNITED, and a powerful revival is in progress.

THE WASTE PLACES.—We have heard of several powerful revivals in places that were destitute of churches. One arose from a debating club, which was reproached with infidelity, but which determined to repel the charge by inviting a preacher, under whose labors a revival immediately commenced. In another place, a hall fitted up for gambling, was turned into a meeting room for prayer, by the conversion of a leading character in putting it up. The whole population were bowing.

REORGANIZATION OF A FIRE DEPARTMENT.—Much has recently been said on this subject, but we have no suggestion that promises half the security for property as the one implied in the follwing:—A young man who has recently become serious, assigned as a reason, the fact, that having belonged to a fire company, the Captain had recently been converted, and now opens the meetings of the company, with prayer. Let intoxicating liquors be excluded and prayer be introduced, and there would be a great difference in the fire insurance.

REVIVAL IN SCOTLAND.—The powerful work of grace which commenced in the parish of Kilsyth, has extended in every direction, and is connected with deep and remarkable excitement. It is arousing attention on every side.

WEST PROSPECT.—So far as I have been able to learn, the first awakenings were on the first sabbath in the present year, under the ordinary services of the sanctuary. Several were then pricked in their hearts, and soon began to cry out in anguish of spirit, what shall I do to be saved?' Our weekly evening meetings soon filled up to overflowing; the place became too strait for us; and we have now for several weeks been obliged to hold them in the meeting-house.

RELIGIOUS INTEREST IN NEW YORK.—We perceive by the Advocate that the church worshiping in the Tabernacle were enjoying quite a refreshing, under the labors of Br. Everts, and that on the commencement of Br. Knapp's labors, fifteen were to be baptized. Crowded and deeply-attentive audiences are now drawn together to hear him. An improved state of feeling is enjoyed by most of the other Baptist churches in the city. "In Oliver street and the South Baptist churhes additions by baptism take place every month, as usual. In Amity street three were baptized recently, and in the church in Brooklyn, under the charge of Br. Ilsley, many additions have been made."—Bap. Reg.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

THE GREAT WESTERN.

This steam ship arrived at the port of N. York at 1 o'clock of the 7th inst. By this arrival London papers were received to the evening of February 19th.

The London papers are filled with accounts of the magnificent display which accompanied the marriage of the Queen, to Prince Albert of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, on the 10th of February.

The news from China had produced great excitement in England. Preparations were making to blockade Canton and compel a restoration of the British trade.

Marriage of the Queen.

Her Majesty, Victoria, was married to Prince Albert on Monday, February 10th, at noon, in the Chapel Royal, at St. James. The details of this interesting event fill several columns of the largest of the London prints. It was celebrated by festivals and rejoicing in every part of the kingdom; the procession in London was the largest which has ever been known since the funeral of the Princes Charlotte of Wales, the crowd being so great that it was with difficulty the entire force of the police could keep open the way for the passage of the royal couple.

The train departed from Buckingham Palace about 12 o'clock. The Prince was dressed in the uniform of a British Field Marshal, and wore no other decoration than the insignia of the Order of the Garter, viz. the collar, with the George appended, set in precious stones, the star of the order set in diamonds, and the Garter itself embroidered in diamonds, round his knee. He was supported on one side by his father, the Duke of Saxe Coburg Gotha, and on the other by his brother.

Her Majesty's procession was very extended, consisting of eighty distinguished individuals, besides pursuivants, heralds, serjeants at arms, ushers, &c. &c. innumerable. Lord Melbourne carried the sword of state. Her Majesty came next, looking anxious and excited. She was paler even than usual. Her dress was a rich white satin, trimmed with orange flower blossoms. On her head she wore a wreath of the same blossoms, over, but not so as to conceal her face, a beautiful veil of Honiton lace was thrown.

Her bridesmaids and trainbearers were similarly attired, save that they had no veils. Her Majesty wore the colar of the Garter, but no other diamonds or jewels. Her attendants were arrayed with similar simplicity; and ladies more beautiful never graced palace, hall, or country-green.

As her Majesty approached the chapel, the national anthem was performed by the instrumental band. Her Majesty walked up the aisle without noticing or bowing to any of the peers. On reaching the haut pas Her Majesty knelt on her footstool, and having performed her private devotions, sat down in her chair of state.

After the lapse of a few seconds her Majesty rose and advanced with the Prince to the communion table, where the Archbishop of Canterbury immediately commenced reading the service, the Bishop of London repeating the responses.

The Archbishop of Canterbury having asked—"Who giveth this woman to be married to this man?"

His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, who occupied a seat on the left of Her Majesty, advanced, and taking Her Majesty's hand, said, "I do." The Archbishop of Canterbury then laid hold of Her Majesty's hand, and pressing it in that of Prince Albert's proceeded with the ceremony.

The service, having concluded, the several members of the Royal Family paid their congratulations, and the Duke of Sussex, after having shaken Her Majesty by the hand in a manner which appeared to have little ceremony, but with cordiality in it, affectionately kissed her check.

After all had passed, with the exception of the Royal bride and bridegroom, Her Majesty stepped hastily across to the other side of the altar, where the Queen Dowager was standing, and kissed her. After this the train returned to the royal castle at Windsor.

In both houses of Parliament, on the 14th of February, addresses of congratulation were carried nemine dissentiente, to Her Majesty the Queen, and to their Royal Highnesses Prince Albert and the Dutchess of Kent.

FROM THE EAST.

CONSTANTINOPLE Jan. 27.—The great news of the day is the quadruple alliance between Russia, England, Austria, and Prussia, who have come to an understanding to garantee the integrity of the Ottoman empire. The Porte has received official advice of the conclusion of this alliance. The news brought to M. de Boutenieff by the steamer Odessa must have been of great importance, inasmuch as the garrison of the last named city was called out by the Governor to break the ice to enable the steamer to leave the port.

LATE FROM CHINA.

By the ship Talbet, Capt. Story, from Canton Nov. 6th, the editors of the Journal of Commerce have a file of the Canton Register (printed at Macao) to Oct. 29th, from which the following news is compiled:

The arrangement which had been entered into for the conducting of the British trade outside of the port of Canton, had been broken up, and all British ships were required by the Chinese High Commissioner to come up to Whampoa or leave the country within three days. In consequence of this, Mr. Elliot on the 26th of October, issued an order requiring the British ships to quit their anchorage at Hong Kong and proceed to Toongkoo Bay; they being, in the first named position, liable to surprise by the Chinese fire-ships and war-boats.

The Americans appear to have been still on good terms with the Chinese, and driving a profitable business.

Two or three English ships, following the example of the Americans, had signed the bond exacted by the Chinese. This seems to have given great offence to the British Superintendant and other British subjects in China.

During the suspension of friendly intercourse between the British subjects and Chinese, a number of lives had been lost on both sides, and other outrages perpetrated.

LATER.—Since the above was in type, we have received the following information from Capt. Story:

The difficulty between the British and Chinese was thought to have been settled, and two British merchant ships had gone to Whampoa, and were informed by the Chinese Governor that he wished all the British vessels to come up and trade as they had done before, but a man must be given up for a Chinese killed in a village, some time since, by an English sailor. Capt. Elliot declared he would not give the man up, and immediately sailed for the Bogue, in the sloop of war Volage, accompanied by another sloop of war, to stop all the other British vessels from sailing for Whampoa. Capt. Elliot sent a letter on shore to the Council, which was returned unopened. Shortly after, the Chinese gun and fire boats, to the number of 300, came around the ship, and was thought with the intention of an attack. They were ordered to leave the ship in thirty minutes, and if they did not leave in that time, would be fired into. No attention however was given to the order from the Volage, and a heavy fire commenced from both sides of the ship, which resulted in the destruction of a number of their boats, and killing about 500 of the Chinese. They made no resistance and those that remained made off as fast as possible. It was the intention of Capt. Elliot to blockade the port of Canton immediately.

The above particulars Capt. Story learned from an American and English Captain, at Maccao, who said they were eye witnesses to the affair.

LATER STILL.—The annexed letter gives a more particular account of the engagement noticed in our last advices from China, than we have elsewhere seen. The breach between the English and Chinese is now so wide, that it will be difficult to heal it, with or without a war. The Chinese are extremely sensitive in regard to the death of any of their people by violence, especially if committed by foreigners; and nothing will appease them but the life of the offender. It was in fact the death of Chinese in affray with some British seamen at Hong Kong, more than any thing else which led to the engagement above referred to. We take it for granted that the British trade with China will be suspended for a time; and it is not improbable that a blockade will ensue,—which, while it lasts, will put a stop to all other foreign trade with China. The next advices from that country will be awaited with much interest.—J. of Com.

Macoa, Nov. 5th, 1839, 10 A. M.

I have now to add a day's later news from Chuenpee of some importance. It appears that the vessels of war anchored there on the morning of the 2d, and sent a communication on shore to H. E.. On the morning of the 3d, they received a requst from the Admiral to move a little farther down the river, which they did. Soon after between 20 and 30 of the war junks were approaching. The volage sent them notice not to come nearer, or they would fire; but the junks came on, evidently with a design of surrounding H. M. ships and giving fight. The Volage and Hayacinth allowed them to come within a convenient distance, and then opened a fire upon them. The skirmish continued nearly an hour, and the result was that several of the junks were sunk, and most of the others disabled. After the first fire of the Volage, many of them began a retreat.

The Chinese have a report down that 400 were killed and the Chinese admiral severely wounded. After the junks had retreated, the Volage exchanged shots with one of the forts. The English did not lose a man—Since the skirmish the sloop of war has called in here to warn any English there might be remaining, and then proceeded to Hong Kong to look after the shipping. We saw them going early last evening.

The Commissioner will be greatly discomfitted when he learns that two British sloops of war have put to flght twenty or more of the flower of the imperial cruisers, and we shall probably see another flaming edict, ordering all intercourse with the red bristled barbarians to cease.

DOMESTIC SUMMARY.

CONGRESS.—The Committee on Elections have finally reported on the New Jersey question. The report favors the election of Messrs. Dickerson, Vroome, Kille, Cooper, and Ryal.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.—The Legislature of New Jersey have abolished the law authorising Imprisonment for Debt. A similar bill has also passed the House of Representatives of Louisiana.

DEFALCATION.—We learn from the N. Y. Express that there has been great sensation in Wall street, in consequence of a large defalcation in the Manhattan Bank. The teller, about to be called to an account by the committee chose to decamp. His cash account is short somewhere from $50,000, to $100,000.

The Press and Type with which the Rochester Daily Democrat is printed, are offered for sale cheap for cash, or at a fair price on a long credit.

One Hundred Houses Swept Off.—The Rev. Mr. Coan, of the Sandwich Islands, in a letter to his brother, published in the Evangelist, describes a scene of terror, witnessed one evening at Hilo during the progress of a protracted meeting, held in November, as follows:—'I opened the meeting with a sermon from the text, 'Prepare ye the way of the Lord.'—God wrought for us. Hundreds gave evidence of conversion. On the second day, at evening, God came in terror! The sea rose suddenly to the perpendicular height of 15 or 20 feet, and fell in one mountain wave on the shore, sweeping away nearly 100 houses, their tenants and effects. All was sudden as a peal of thunder. No premonitions were given. None had time to flee. There was no earthquake, and no visible cause of the phenomena. The scene was awful. In a moment, hundreds were engulphed. The roar of the raging sea was deafening, and the loud piercing cries of distress, were heart-rending! Only eleven were drowned; but five have died since, by injuries received in the water. Had the catastrophe been less amphibious, hundreds must have perished. To drown a native of these islands, is almost like drowning a whale; so much are they at home in the water.

DUNGEONS OF THE INQUISITION IN NEW ORLEANS.—Mysterious.—A curious discovery has been made by workmen employed in erecting houses on the site of the old calaboose. The ancient building, which dates far back into the Spanish times, was recently pulled down, and the ground on which it stood sold out to private individuals. The purchasers immediately commenced improvements upon the property, being valuable, from its location in the center of the city. In the course of operations to this effect, it was found necessary to dig several feet under the surface, to lay a substratum for the walls of the houses about to be built. The laborers, in excavating at a particular spot, discovered that their progress was retarded by some hard substance, which resisted any impressions from the working tools.

On examination, the resisting substance was found to be a bar of iron. Curiosity was excited. The excavation was extended—another and another bar or hoop of iron was discovered, and at length a space in the bottom of the hole that had been dug gave way, or rather sunk, and disclosed between the hoops of iron the interior of a dungeon. When first opened the inside was dry, the ooze from the river being excluded by water cement, and contained nothing but a few human bones, the remains of some victims of tyranny or superstition.

After the walls were broken by the tools of the workmen, the water flowed in through the fractures and filled up the cavity. In consequence of the interior being overflowed it was found impossible to explore the subterranean passage to any great distance. The supposition is that the cavern is extensive, and has branches undermining the ground in several directions. When we visited the spot yesterday, a crowd was assembled around the excavation, and a fire engine was at work pumping out the water. Various conjectures are indulged as to who were the builders of the diabolical contrivance. It was doubtless constructed simultaneously with the prison, and the best clue to the discovery will be to trace the history of the old Calaboose, and ascertain its founders.—New Orleans Bulletin.

In one of the vaults we learn there was found a gold crucifix, weighing twenty-eight pounds, as also a quantity of human bones. At the bottom of this vault a door was discovered, apparently leading to vaults still deeper.

The buildings which formerly occupied this square were the property of the Jesuits, more than one hundred years ago.—Pic.

Warlike—Her Majesty's ship Vestal has arrived at Halifax, where, we understand, other vessels of war are soon expected, for the purpose of bringing troops and munitions of war to this province, in case they should be required.

We learn, also, that the 23d Fusileers, now in garrison at Halifax, instead of being about to proceed to the East Indies, is the first regiment for service in this province, and has received orders to be ready to move at the shortest notice.

We are further informed, on good authority, that the erection of barracks at Woodstock, in this Province, for the accommodation of a large military force, has been determined upon, and the work is to commence immediately.

These precautions we presume, are taken in accordance with the views expressed by the British Minister at Washington to the American Secretary of State, under date of the 26th January. The continued persistance of Governor Fairfield in acts of aggression on the disputed teritory, contrary to existing arrangements, (while the British authorities, as will appear by Mr. Fox's letter, and spirit,) and the repeated threats of of his determination to take possession of the teritory, could not fail to arouse our authorities to a sense of their duty, and have no doubt caused the present warlike demonstrations.—We sincerely trust, however, that the United States Government will perceive the difficulties into which the refractory Governor of Maine is about plunging the two nations, and at once interpose to prevent the awful calamities of either a border or a general war.

Shipwreck.—The Schooner Financier, Captain Butler, of this port, from Matanzas, for Charleston, with a cargo of sugar, coffee and fruit, was lost on Sambrero Key, 13th inst at 3 o'clock, A. M. Part of the coffee, sails, rigging and crew saved, and taken to Key West by the wreckers, vessel totally lost, vessel and cargo insured.—Charleston Mercury.

Great Fire at Wilmington, Del.—On Wednesday afternoon last, a fire broke out in this city, which destroyed a very large amount of property. It is one of a series of destructive fires which have occured there within a few months past, and is the largest which has happened for many years. The fire is supposed to be the work of an incendiary.

Important from Mexico—Battling—Victory of Monteroy.—New Orleans papers of the 14th inst, state that private letters had been received in that city from Tampico by the schooner Doric, giving information of importance respecting the movements of the federalists. They had intercepted the detachment under General Arista, in the vicinity of Monteroy. A battle ensued, which resulted in the signal defeat of the centralists. The particulars are not ascertained—only the general results, that the goverment troops were overthrown and dispersed or made prisoners. Arista effected his escape, badly wounded with a rifle ball (which we suppose some Texian marksman lodged in his body,) and was retreating upon San Luis Potosi. A large body of the defeated party are reported to have joined the victorious army.

The Bulletin says:

"The voluntary expatriation of Santa Anna would be a happy riddance to the country. Ever since he assumed a conspicuous figure on the theatre of politics, Mexico has been a scene of turmoil—desolated by intestine dissensions and civil war; nor is there any hope of a better state of things until the expulsion from the soil of that arch adversary to liberty, and the other upholders of sacerdotal and military tyranny."

POETRY.

THE HOUR OF DEATH.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north-wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death!

Day is for mortal care,
Eve for glad meetings round the joyous hearth,
Night for the dreams of sleep, the voice of prayer;
But all for thee, thou Mightiest of the earth!

The banquet hath its hour,
Its feverish hour of mirth, and song, and wine;
There comes a day for grief's o'erwhelming power,
A time for softer tears—but all are thine!

Youth and the opening rose
May look like things too glorious for decay,
And smile at thee!—but thou art not of those
That wait the ripen'd bloom to seize their prey!

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north-wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death.

We know when moons shall wane,
When summer-birds from far shall cross the sea,
When Autumn's hue shall tinge the golden grain;
But who shall teach us when to look for thee?

Is it when Spring's first gale
Comes forth to whisper where the violets lie?
Is it when roses in our paths grow pale?
They have one season—all are ours to die!

Thou art where billows foam,
Thou art where music melts upon the air;
Thou art around us in our peaceful home,
And the world calls us forth—and thou art there!

Thou art where friend meets friend,
Beneath the shadow of the elm to rest;
Thou art where foe meets foe, and trumpets rend
The skies, and swords beat down the princely crest.

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north-wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death!

MISCELLANEOUS.

A THANKSGIVING DINNER.

It was a bleak day in the month of November. The north wind howled mournfully through the leafless trees—the broken clouds flitted rapidly across the face of the heavens—and the whole face of nature assumed an aspect, cheerless and uncomfortable—well calculated to remind the moralists of the closing scenes in the great drama of life—as a traveler, with weary steps wended his solitary way through one of those beautiful hamlets which abound in New England—and which constitute the noble ornaments, emblems of freedom, peace and happiness, of which he is justly proud.

To judge from his costume, the traveler belonged to the humblest ranks of life—or had been singled out as a victim by misfortune. His coarse straw hat, his patched doublet, and his canvass trousers, soiled by tar in many places—while they proclaimed his occupation and his poverty, seemed but poorly calculated to protect him from the inclemency of the weather. His form was cast in a noble mould, denoting great activity and strength. His manly features, bronzed by exposure to the tropical sun, and partly concealed from view by his luxuriant locks of coal-black hue, showed that he was still in the dawn of manhood. And his eyes seemed lighted up with an intelligent spirit—by a gleam of expectation and hope, which showed that his humble fortunes did not accord with his noble nature—and that however severely fate had dealt with him, his energies were still unbroken—and that maugre the chill northern blast, and the fatigues which it was evident he had recently undergone, he was resolved to push onward until the object which he had in view was accomplished.

"It is now three years," said he to himself, as he plodded along the road, "since I very foolishly left my happy home, urged by a silly pique, and a love for a life of adventure, to brave the hardships and perils of the ocean. Since then my life has been a constant series of misfortunes. I have met with storms on every tack. But thank Providence, although my canvass is sadly reduced and pretty well worn out—and my pockets are destitute of ballast, my hull is unimpaired, and my spirits are as unbroken and as buoyant as ever. I hope my parents are still living, and prosperous and happy—I was a fool to leave. And my brothers and sisters—how happy we were together—and cousin Mary—that bright little fairy, whom I loved with a love surpassing that of cousins—and in whose company I passed so many rapturous hours! Oh, I was a great fool to leave such blissful scenes.—And I believe after all, that the little fairy loved me! I know she did—she all but told me so. But it is too late now to retrace my steps—I can only regret my folly. I dare say the bright and joyous young thing has forgotten Ned Willis, and was married to some worthier fellow than I am long since. For her rosy cheeks, and laughing eyes, and sweet disposition, to say nothing of the property she was to inherit when she came of age, attracted many admirers—and made sad havoc among the hearts of the youths of the village. Well, if she is married, there is no more to be said—I have no right to complain. But I hope she has chosen a good husband. I will see her once more—wish her a long life and a happy one—and away to sea again. But if she is not married——" He did not finish the sentence, but a change came over the countenance of the ill-clad and weather-beaten mariner, as he was indulging in a vision of rapture—and he involuntarily quickened his pace.

As Edward Willis journeyed onward towards his home, anticipating by turns happy and adverse fortunes, he was surprised to find that although it was in the middle of the week, there was no signs of labor among the inhabitants. All was quiet—even the oxen was browsing contentedly in the pastures—the school-houses were closed, and the meeting houses were open—the people whom he met with neatly arrayed in their Sunday clothes—and their countenances were wreathed in smiles of gratitude and joy. On enquiry, he learned that it was THANKSGIVING DAY. He hailed the information as a glad omen.

On the day when this poor forlorn-looking traveler after years of wandering, was pursuing his way towards his native village the fire burned brightly on the hearth-stone of his parents. Deacon Willis was a New England Farmer—a man who, by cherishing the virtues of industry and frugality, had become possessed of a handsome property; and who, enjoying a competence in a free country, protected by a wise government, surrounded by kind and intelligent neighbors, and in the midst of a happy and virtuous family, envied neither nabobs their riches, nor monarchs their power.

It was Thanksgiving Day, and great had been the bustle in Deacon Willis' family for the previous week. Descended in a direct line from one of the earliest settlers of New-England, no consideration could have induced the worthy Deacon to abate one jot of the "pomp and pride and circumstance" of the Thanksgiving to the Puritans. Thanksgiving was religiously observed by him, as it had been by his father before him—and the gratitude which he expressed to his Creator for the mercies which he had received, was not a mere formula of unmeaning words, but came directly from the heart.

On this day his children were collected all around him; and all anticipated a joyous Thanksgiving. Several of his distant relations who were not so well provided with the good things of this life as the Deacon, also accepted an invitation to be present. Among those who were sheltered by his hospitable roof on this occasion, the greatest favorite seemed to be Mary Wadsworth, a blue-eyed damsel, whose lovely and expressive face told more about sweet ness and purity than I could describe in a folio volume. She was the only danghter of a cousin of the worthy Deacon's and at an early age was deprived of her parents by death. But Deacon Willis had been to her a parent. His house had been her home; his wife had treated her with a mother's kindness; and his children regarded her as a sister and a dear friend.

Mrs. Willis' situation as Mistress of the family, was no sinecure on that day. Her duties were various and important; for it was the New England Holiday, and all her skill as a housewife—all her excellence as a manager were put to the test on Thanksgiving Day. After the family returned from meeting—for they were old fashioned people, who would almost as soon lose their Thanksgiving dinner as be deprived of their Thanksgiving sermon—the table was set in the large front parlor, which was wont to be used only on extraordinary occasions and serious preparations for the festival commenced. A good fire made of walnut and yellow oak wood burned cheerfully in the large open fire place—and all the females belonging to the house were put in requisition to bear the abundance of the good things from the kitchen to the parlor, and which, when deposited in their respective places, made the tables groan again.

At the head of the table, was placed a portly turkey, the choicest of a large and pampered family; at the further extremity was deposited a ham of a size and flavor to make a Westphalian's eye sparkle with joy. On the centre was stationed, plucked, roasted, and ready for the carving knife, one of those celebrated animals, which whilom saved from the ravages of the Gauls, the capital of Rome, and which in vulgar parlance, are yclept geese! while here and there, scattered round the table, in apparent disorder, but with deliberate care and precision, were boiled fowls, roasted fowls, jellies, knicknacks, and plates of vegetables of more varieties and excellence than I would willingly undertake to enumerate, while on the kitchen table arranged apparently as a corps de reserv, might be seen a stately plum pudding, supported by several enormous Thanksgiving pumpkin pies, with mince pies, apple pies and squash pies, and custard pies, with fruits of different kinds, not forgetting nuts and apples, to bring up the rear. As a beverage on this happy occasion, water was the only article provided—water brought from a clear and sparkling spring, which bubbled up a few rods from the house; for farmer Willis contended that water was the best drink, even on festive occasions; hilarity and joy should be promoted, not by wine or strong drink of any kind, but by social communion, by a free interchange of thoughts and ideas, by generous feelings, born and nurtured in a publick bosom. It was nearly two o'clock long after their accustomed hours of dinner before the assembled company were invited into the parlor to partake of the good cheer which had been so bountifully provided. And as the happy company stood around the table, waiting for their host to ask the Divine Blessing upon the meal which was placed before them, a shade fllitted across the good man's brow—for his eldest boy, a nobls boy was absent. Among the joyful faces which surrounded him, Edward's was not seen. He had left his home years before, to embrace a sea-faring life—and the wanderer had not returned. There was good reason to believe that he was no longer in the land of the living—and altho' they still strove to cherish hopes in each other's bosoms, many and bitter were the tears of affection which had imbalmed his memory.

"My poor, dear boy!" exclaimed Mr. Willis. "Ah, I much fear we shall never see his smiling face again."

Mary Wadsworth said nothing—but a tear started into her eye—and any casual observer would of seen at once that Edward Willis was dearer to her than a cousin and a friend—and that she cherished his memory in the very depths of her heart.

Just then old Bose, the house-dog, was heard to make some angry remonstrance to a passing traveler, which attracted attention, inasmuch as it was by no means an ordinary occurrence—for Bose was a well nurtured brute, and seldom accosted a well dressed, gentlemanly personage, in a rude and angry manner, but he entertained the prejudice against the victims of misfortune or intemperance, who wear the garb of poverty, which is cherished by noble animals, who boast the attributes of reason. In truth, Bose, although a faithful dog, was a real aristocrat in his principles. The traveler, from his appearance, moved in the humblest rank of life—and Bose evidently intended to give him a reception corresponding with his shabby appearance, and was advancing towards him in a surly manner, and with a truculent look, when Deacon Willis, who well knew the peculiarities of his dog, told his son James to go out and protect the stranger from violence, "He seems a sailor too," said he, "and on a day like this, we should not refuse the rites of hospitality to the humblest being who passes along the road. On Thanksgiving day, no individual, rich or poor, sailor or landsman, should want for a plentiful meal. Ask him in, my son," continued the noble hearted farmer—"and let the poor wayfarer take a seat at our board."

The stranger entered the parlor, and room was made for him at the table. But his appearance and manner were strange, and he seemed as if he was but ill-disposed to requite his kind host for the hospitality he enjoyed. He did not even raise his dilapidated hat from his head—and to the kind inquiries which were made of him, he scarcely deigned any reply—but as if overcome with reply—or agitated by contending emotions, he threw himself into the nearest chair, and covered his brow with his hands.

The wondering group witnessed his conduct in silence. "Come now, my good man," at length exclaimed Mrs. Willis in a kind motherly tone, "I dare say you are tired and hungry—take a seat at the table and make yourself at home. We like sailors and would gladly do you a good turn for the sake of one who has long been absent. Don't cry, Mary—you should learn to restrain your feelings."

Just then old Bose, who when the sailor first came in sight, was disposed to regard him as an enemy, appeared to have overcome his combative propensities, and much to the surprise of the children, seemed suddenly to have conceived the most lively attachment to the "poor straggler." He wagged his tail with unwonted energy, absolutely danced around him, whined forth his joy in the most expressive manner, and continued the pantomine by jumping into his lap and attempting to lick his face!

The stranger hardly attempted to repulse the affectionate animal—but gently patting his head addressed him with the endearing epithet of "Poor old Bose"—adding "you have not forgotten me."

He then raised his head, took his hand from his forehead—removed his hat, and brushed away the long and matted locks which partly concealed his features. His voice seemed to have touched a chord in the bosoms of persons present, which had long ceased to vibrate. The eyes of Deacon Willis and his wife were turned upon him in eager expectation. Mary Wadsworth started—the rose on her cheek gave place to the lily—and her deep-seated and pure love proved more quick-sighted than even parental affection. She gazed upon him with a look in which joy and surprise were blended—and met his glance, which beamed with tenderness and rapture—expressing the fruition of earthly enjoyment. Her maidenly reserve was conquered by her surprise and joy at beholding before her, a dear one whom she had long mourned as lost. "It is my cousin Edward!" said she, and she threw herself into his arms.

The scene that followed may be imagined, but cannot be described, nor shall I attempt it. There was no longer an alloy in the enjoyment of that happy family, and Deacon Willis, albeit, always noted for his piety, never offered up a thanksgiving prayer with greater fervency and sincerity than on that occasion. After dinner was over, Edward had a long tale to tell, to which his auditors listened with breathless attention, of the perils and sufferings he had experienced during the previous three years. The vessel in which he had sailed for South America, had been suspected of carrying on a contraband trade—and the crew were all condemned to the mines for life. Edward, with two of his companions, at the imminent risk of his life, succeeded in effecting his escape, and had worked his passage home in a vessel bound to Providence. Misfortune pursued him; the vessel was wrecked on Block Island during a heavy gale, and he, after a desperate struggle with the waves, succeeded in gaining the shore. He lost no time in proceeding to Providence in a fishing craft, when he took his land tacks on board—and wearied, hungry, destitute of money and clothes, a poor shipwrecked sailor, Edward at length reached his home.

"And you are welcome home, my boy," exclaimed his father; "and I hope you will never again leave us."

Edward looked at Mary, who blushed like a penny.

"I see how the wind sits," said the worthy Deacon. "Come hither Mary Wadsworth."

Mary, with trembling steps, approached her guardian.

"Mary," said the Deacon; "we must look to you for security that Edward will never play truant again."

He put her trembling hand in that of his son.

Edward has never been to sea since. He is now a happy and prosperous farmer—and blessed with an affectionate wife, and three lovely children. He every year welcomes the approach of November, and reads in the Mercantile Journal, with keen gratification, the Governor's Proclamation for THANKSGIVING DAY.

FOR THE FARMER.

From the Cultivator.

WHEAT.

Every thing relating to this plant, its production, cultivation, and improvement, must always be of paramount interest to the farmer of the middle and northern states, as well as those of the vast west, as on this crop the country not only relies for bread, but also for one of its most available articles, next to cotton, for the purposes of exportation. Western New-York has justly become celebrated for its beautiful wheat, and the excellence of its flour, an eminence which it is hoped will be long retained, and we think certainly will be, if the modes of culture best adapted for the production of this crop, are adopted and persevered in by our citizens, and pains taken to improve our varieties by proper selections at home, or importations of approved kinds from abroad. It should be borne in mind, however, that a variety producing excellent grain in England, will not necessarily succeed here;—causes existing in the nature of the climate and seasons may prevent this; neither should the failure for the first year induce the rejection of a promising variety, as it is well known that acclimization is as much required by plants as by animals.

We imagine that the best method of improving our varieties of wheat will be by selection, choosing one or more heads that appear to combine the greatest number of desirable qualities as it regards the berry, flour, length and shape of ear, quality and stiffness of straw, hardihood, and apparent liability to disease, and cultivating from these alone. We cannot doubt that in the hands of a man of science, skill, and observation, results might thus be produced as favorable to the production of wheat in the United States, as the same course of labor, in the hands of Le Gasca, and Le Conteur, have proved to the agriculturists of England and Europe. We have scarcely heard of a sustained and well conducted effort to improve our varieties by selection; and but very few to effect an increase of our crops, by the introduction from abroad of new kinds, and thoroughly testing their qualities. The kind of wheat called in Cayuga county the Canada flint, and in Onondaga county the Cummings wheat, from the name of the gentleman who introduced it, and which is rapidly taking the place of the common flint wheat, is unquestionably an English wheat, introduced into Canada, acclimated, and from thence brought as we know it was, to the United States. We are assured by extensive farmers, that their wheat of the new variety, produced from one-fifth to one-third more per acre than the old flint wheat in equally favorable circumstances; and hence we may judge of the immense value that would have been added to the wheat crop of the state, had that variety, instead of the old, been generally used for seed the previous year.—That seed will degenerate is unquestionable; the experiments of Le Gasca place the matter beyond a doubt; and that new varieties may be made to take the place of the old, is equally certain. The cause of degeneracy is probably to be found in the want of proper care on the part of the farmer in the selection of his seed; and on this point he should take a lesson from nature, whose productions are, when the action is not interfered with, usually from the most vigorous and healthy seeds alone, these by their natural vigor taking and maintaining the precedence of all others.

But our object in commencing these remarks was not so much an essay on wheat culture, as to call attention to the communication below from a gentleman, who, by the successful experiment he has made in introducing a new variety of spring wheat, has shown not only the practicability but the feasibility of such undertakings. Some of the wheat grown by Col. Abbott the past season, was, we understand, exhibited at the Onondaga Co. cattle show and fair, and excited much notice from its fine appearance and its origin. We raised a number of bushels of this wheat from seed obtained from Col. Abbott, and find its qualities to correspond with those so well described by him. The contrast in the brightness of the straw, and freedom from lodging, between this wheat and some Italian wheat sowed beside it, was striking. It was slightly shrunk however, as was spring wheat generally. The wheat of Col. Abbott, which we had the pleasure of seeing at his residence, is the finest spring wheat we have noticed this season; berry full and bright.

"EDITORS OF THE CULTIVATOR.—According to the promise made in the 6th No. page 82, of the Monthly Genesee Farmer, for 1839, in a paper relating to the conversion of winter into spring wheat, I enclose you the result of my experience with the new wheat the past season.

"It proves to be the best wheat I have raised this season, both in quality and in quantity. It retains many of its primitive winter wheat qualities, and is inferior in no respect, to the very best varieties of spring wheat yet known among us. In the same field, sowed the same day, the product of the new wheat was one and a half to one of the Italian, and while the latter was very badly lodged, the new variety stood erect, a bright stiff straw, that good judges might very readily have mistaken for fine winter wheat.

"I have never had so large a yield of wheat as many writers relate, but I have grown good wheat; and the present experiment produced at the rate of twenty-eight bushels per acre. By comparing the quantity and quality of this new production with the other varieties of spring wheat, I feel myself amply repaid for the labor of the experiment. It has shown me that new varieties can be produced, as old ones degenerate; and that the experimental farmer, may, by care and attention, produce the very best kinds of seed on his own farm.

"Yours, truly, W. ABBOTT.
Otisco, Onondaga, 1839."

FOR THE LAWYER.

THE LAWYER'S PRAYER.

Lines found in the pocket book of D. O. H——, Esq. after his decease.

Ordained to tread the thorny ground
Where few, I fear, are faithful found,
Mine be the conscience void of blame,
The upright heart, the spotless name;
The tribute of the widow's's prayer,
The righted orphan's grateful tear:
To virtue and her friends, a friend,
Still may my voice the weak defend:
Ne'er may my prostituted tongue
Protect the oppressor in his wrong,
Nor wrest the spirit of the laws,
To sanctify a villain's cause!
Let others with unsparing hand,
Scatter their poison through the land;
Inflame dissension, kindle strife,
And strew with ills the path of life,
On such, her gifts let fortune shower,
And wealth to wealth, and power to power;
On me may fav'ring heaven bestow
The peace which good men only know:
The joy of joy by few possessed,
The 'ternal sunshine of the breast;
Power, fame, and riches I resign,
The praise of honesty be mine,
That friends may weep, the worthy sigh,
And poor men bless me when I die.

MAJESTY OF LAW.

"The spirit of the law is all equity and justice. In a government based on true principle, the law is the sole soverein of a nation. It watches over its subjects in their business, in their recreation, and in their sleep. It guards their fortunes, and their honors. In the broad noon-day and the dark midnight, it ministers to their security. It accompanies them to the altar and the festal board. It watches over the ship of the merchant, though a thousand leagues intervene; over the seed of the husbandman, abandoned for a season to the earth: over the studies of the student, the labors of the mechanic, the opinions of every man. None are high enough to offend it with impunity, none so low that it scorns to protect them. It is throned with the king, and sits in the seat of the republican magistrate; but it also hovers over the couch of the lonely, and stands sentinel at the prison, scrupulously preserving to the felon whatever rights he has not forfeited. The light of the law illumines the palace and the hovel, and surrounds the cradle and the bier. The strength of the law laughs wickedness to scorn, and spurns the intrenchments of iniquity. The power of the law crushes the power of man, and strips wealth of unrighteous immunity. It is the thread of Dandalus to guide us through the labyrinths of cunning. It is the spear of Ithuriel, to detect falsehood and deceit. It is the faith of the martyr to shield us from the fires of persecution—it is the good man's reliance—the wicked one's dread—the bulwark of piety—the upholder of morality—the guardian of right—the distributor of justice. Its power is irresistible—its dominion indisputable. It is above us and around us—we cannot fly from its protection—we cannot avert its vengeance.

"Of law there can be no less acknowledged, than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world: all things in heaven and earth do her homage, the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power: both angels, and men, and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent, admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy."

FOR MOTHERS.

A MOTHER'S INSTRUCTION.

The following quotation from an address of the Principal of the Flushing Institute, Rev. Dr. Muhlenburg, should be laid to the heart of every mother.

"We are often asked, 'What kind of boys do you want?' To this question too, the theory of our institution furnishes an answer.—Give us such boys as have been blessed with the instructions of a pious mother. This is a qualification for which no substitute can be found on earth. Never would we despair of the child who has been used in infancy to hear the precepts of heavenly truth inculcated in the accents of maternal love. Truths thus instilled live forever in the memory. They are interwoven with all the sensibilities of the soul. They are the fortress of conscience; not impregnable, it is true, but indestructible. They furnish the mind with chords which in later life seldom fail to vibrate to the touch of faithful expostulation. They are an inextinguishable spark, which after being seemingly smothered under a heap of corruption, may be fanned by the breath of friendly and spiritual counsel into the genial flame of piety. The child of a mother's prayers, said St. Augustine, (and may we not believe it?) is never lost. It is those children who have been dedicated to their Maker under the auspices of a pious and vigilant mother, whose education we should esteem it a happy and useful vocation to continue. While on the other hand we should deem it an act of temerity equally hopeless and presumptuous, to become responsible for the youth in whose mind a mother's voice was connected with no other associations than those of apathy to religion and devotedness to the character and frivolities of the world."—Flushing Journal.

The Empire State.

THE LARGEST NEWSPAPER IN NEW-YORK.

TERMS—Three Dollars per annum, or two copies for Five Dollars.

The publishers of THE EMPIRE STATE, having completed their arrangements for the Enlarged Series of that paper, will issue on Thursday, January 9th, the first number of the largest Newspaper ever published in New York. Having procured new materials wherewith to execute the printing in a style of elegance unsurpassed by any other newspaper—and having also secured such aid in the several departments, local and general, literary and political, of the paper, as to ensure its worth as a valuable FAMILY NEWSPAPER, the publishers offer it with entire confidence to the patronage of an enlightened public, and a full reliance upon their taste and discrimination for support.

We have chosen the title of "The Empire State," as expressive not only of our attachment to the interests of New York, but of the Union; for whatever interests New York, in a great degree, interests the Union—whether in prosperity or in adversity.—And, as the Empire City is the great centre of business and commerce of the country—the point also where Intelligence from the European World is first received, and from which it radiates throughout the Union; so is New York, in many respects, if not in all, the most eligible point for the establishment of a valuable National Newspaper, as the medium through which shall be diffused to the States and Territories of the Republic, the earliest Intelligence, general and political, from every part of the world.

* * * * * *

The mammoth size of our paper enabling us to present weekly an amount of matter contained in no other paper—we shall labor to present such a variety, original and selected, as will suit the tastes of all classes. The Politician, the Moralist, the Farmer, the Mechanic, the Merchant, and Professional Man, the Student and the Antiquary, the lover of humor, and such as would unfold a "Map of the Busy World,"—each and all may find amusement and instruction in the ample pages of the Empire State.

Some prominent features will be given to the paper, not found in any other. The utmost pains will be taken to present, at the earliest date, all important intelligence from every State in the Union—to collect and preserve Statistics and Important Facts, civil, political, and miscellaneous—to give full accounts of the proceedings of Congress, and of the Legislatures of the States—the best Speeches of distinguished American Orators and Statesmen—Memoirs of Eminent Men—Original Tales, Essays, and Poetry—Collections in the History and Antiquities of the Country—Improvements in Agriculture, and the Arts—Gems from the Current Literature of the Day—Notices of all New Works worthy of commendation—and Occurrences at Home and Abroad, commercial, monetary, or of whatever nature that can be of interest to the mass of readers throughout the country.

More, perhaps, we need not say—but submit our labors to the candid judgment of the public.

SOLITUDE.

Perhaps there is nothing but death that would strike the mind of man with more terror, than the thoughts of being entirely secluded from society. Yet there is in solitude, when voluntarily sought, a pleasure that is not to be found in the bustling scenes of life. There, every thing is hushed to silence. There, is a safe retreat from the tempestuous elements of strife and contention. There, is an opportunity to contemplate, in silence, what is past, and what is future. The pilgrim, in his imagination, can take a solitary flight to the land of his nativity, the home of his childhood; and memory, quick and active, brings to view scenes which awaken emotions of thrilling interest.

Solitude may be called a workshop, in which the mighty minds of genius have wrought out the wonderful structures of science and of art. There the most profound philosophers have constructed those fabrics of wisdom which have called forth the admiration of the world.

To the chamber of solitude the disconsolate, whose hearts are stricken with grief, may resort for solace and instruction. When we look into the holy scriptures we behold the Savior of mankind often seeking some place of retirement, in which he might give himself up to meditation and communion with his Father in Heaven.—And there are none to whom solitude presents a more welcome retreat than to his meek and humble followers. There, they can contemplate, in silence, the sublime mysteries of redemption. There they can scan the secret workings of their own innate tendencies—detect and crucify what is wrong, and approve what is right.—There, in the hallowed silence of solitude, they can listen to the teachings of that "still small voice" which whispers in their ear, "this is the way, walk ye in it." And there too they can, by the eye of faith, cast a glance forward into that vast eternity to which they are hastening, and survey the inheritance of the pure in heart.

Who can feel lonely and forsaken, like 'a sea-bird o'er the wavy Ocean,' while his immortal mind is winging its way through the wonderful mysteries of the Creator's works?

> Who is a cheerless, lonely one,
> While in solitude he strays,
> Beholds a summer's setting sun,
> With all its golden rays?
> Then comes the glorious orb of night,
> With her majestic train,
> And pours her mellow streams of light
> O'er solitude's domain.
> Then let these lovely pleasing scenes,
> In memory oft be viewed;
> When there's no other hope that gleams,
> Then flee to solitude. D. S.

RELIGIOUS.

MRS. SARAH LANMAN SMITH.

The memoir of Mrs. Smith, (wife of the Rev. Eli Smith, missionary in Syria) prepared by Rev. E. W. Hooker, of Bennington, has been republished in London. The last number of the Biblical Repository contains a review of it by Rev. Nehemiah Adams, of Boston. We copy from the review, a passage relating to Mrs. Smith's death:

Two years and four months ago, she had embarked from Boston as a missionary. How much she left behind! How short her missionary life, how great the disappointment at the early interruption of her work by death! "That destroyest the hope of man!" And yet

"Sept. 22.—In the afternoon, she said to me with much earnestness, 'When you write to my friends, after all is over, one thing I wish you would make prominent. It is, that I feel satisfied with the course I have taken, and that all has been ordered by God.' [Meaning in her becoming a missionary.] 'I have no disposition to boast of my labors; but I feel that I have not left my friends and my country in vain. I never have regretted having done so, nor do I now. This is my dying testimony.' p. 358.

"'Tell my friends I would not for all the world lay my remains any where but here, on missionary ground.' After a good many remarks, showing the brightness of her views of spiritual things, some of which could be but indistinctly heard, she exclaimed, 'What a goodly company of ancestors shall I meet there! Yes, and the holy angels, and the Son of God! Oh, the Almighty God! You know nothing of his glorious majesty. I cannot express it; but I wanted to speak of it, that you may think that yourselves are nothing. I have thought too much of myself. In this sickness I have thought it too important that my plans and wants should be consulted. We all think that we are of more importance than we are. Beware of pride.'"

We sung that beautiful hymn of Doddridge on the eternal Sabbath, commencing,

'Thine earthly Sabbaths, Lord, we love.'

"To my surprise, her voice, which she had so long been unable to use for singing, was occasionally heard mingling with ours. Her face beamed with a smile of ecstasy; and so intense was the feeling expressed in her whole aspect, that we stopped after the first verse, lest she should even expire while drinking the cup of joy we had presented to her. But she said to us, 'Go on;' and though all were bathed in tears, and hardly able to articulate, we proceeded. I was sitting with her hand in mine. While singing the second verse, she pressed it, and turned to me at the same time such a heavenly smile as stopped my utterance. Before we reached the end, she raised both her hands above her head, and gave vent to her feelings in tears of pleasure, and almost in shouting. After prayer, she said, 'I have had a little glimpse of what I am going to see. It was but a glimpse, and perhaps it was imagination. But it seemed a glorious sight.'" p. 360, 1.

In the account of her last moments we have an interesting fact.

"Involuntary groans were occasionally uttered in her convulsions. These, as we were listening to them with painful sympathy, once to our surprise melted away into musical notes; and for a moment our ears were charmed with the full, clear tones of the sweetest melody. No words were articulated, and she was evidently unconscious of every thing about her. It seemed as if her soul was already joining in the songs of heaven, while it was yet so connected with the body, as to command its unconscious sympathy.—374.

We can never forget the effect of this incident upon our minds when we first heard it read. We cannot remember any incident in the dying scene of any individual so peculiar and striking. We have been accustomed to consider the last moments of Mr. Evarts, taking into view his natural temperament, as more remarkable than those of any other departed friend whom we have ever known. One of his exclamations was, "O! the face of God!" Perhaps this was only anticipation; it may have been a vision. But the incident referred to in the last moments of Mrs. Smith is very striking. Those musical sounds were wonderful. They remind one of those which are said to have come from Memnon's statue at sunrise. They were the accidental notes of the harp, when one is removing the strings. The swan's last song is sweetest; so was it with this "when fleeing to her mountain." The passage last quoted from the memoir will, we doubt not, long be remembered by all who read the book.

"Not long after, she again opened her eyes in a state of consciousness. A smile of perfect happiness lighted up her emaciated features. She looked deliberately around upon different objects in the room, and then fixed upon me a look of the tenderest affection. * * * Her frequent prayers that the Saviour would meet her in the dark valley, have already been mentioned. By her smile, she undoubtedly intended to assure us, that she had found him. Words she could not utter to express what she felt. Life continued to struggle with its last enemy, until twenty minutes before eight o'clock; when her affectionate heart gradually ceased to beat, and her soul took its final departure to be forever with the Lord." p. 364.

She died Sept. 30, 1836, in the 34th year of her age, having been a missionary about two years and four months.

ON PRAYER.

Prayer is an all-efficient panoply; a treasure undiminished; a mine which never is exhausted; a sky unobscured by clouds; a haven unruffled by the storm: it is the root, the fountain, and the mother of a thousand thousand blessings.—I speak not of the prayer which is cold and feeble, and devoid of energy; I speak of that which is the child of a contrite spirit, the offspring of a soul converted, born in a blaze of unutterable inspiration, and winged, like lightning, for the skies.

The potency of prayer hath subdued the strength of fire; it hath bridled the rage of lions; hushed anarchy to rest; extinguished wars; appeased the elements; expelled demons; burst the chains of death; expanded the gates of heaven; assuaged diseases; repelled frauds; rescued cities from destruction; it hath stayed the sun in its course, and arrested the progress of the thunderbolt: in a word, it hath destroyed whatever is an enemy to man.—I again repeat, that I speak not of the prayer engendered by the lips; but of that which ascends from the recesses of the heart. Assuredly, there is nothing more potent than prayer; yea, there is nothing comparable to it. A monarch vested in gorgeous habiliments, is far less illustrious than a kneeling suppliant, ennobled and adorned by communion with his God.—Consider how august a privilege it is, when angels are present, and archangels throng around; when cherubim and seraphim encircle with their blaze the throne; that a mortal may approach with unrestrained confidence, and converse with heaven's dread Sovereign! Oh! what honor was ever conferred like this! When a Christian stretches forth his hands and invokes his God, in that moment he leaves behind him all terrestrial pursuits, and traverses on the wings of intellect the realms of life; he contemplates celestial objects only, and knows not of the present state of things during the period of his prayer: provided that prayer be breathed with fervency. Could we but pray with fervency; could we pray with a soul resuscitated, a mind awakened, an understanding quickened, then were satan to appear, he would instantaneously fly; were the gates of hell to yawn upon us, they would close again.

Prayer is a haven to the ship-wrecked mariner; an anchor unto them that are sinking in the waves; a staff to the limbs that totter; a mine of jewels to the poor, a security to the rich, a healer of disease, and a guardian of health. Prayer at once secures the continuance of our blessings, and dissipates the cloud of our calamities. O prayer! O blessed prayer!—Thou art the unwearied conqueror of human woes; the firm foundation of human happiness; the source of ever-during joy; the mother of philosophy! The man who can pray truly, though languishing in extremest indigence, is richer than all beside; whilst the wretch who never bowed the knee, though proudly seated as monarch of the nations, is of all men most destitute.

Let us then direct our thoughts to Him that was poor, yet rich; rich because he was poor. Let us overlook the enjoyments of the present, and desire the blessings of the future; for so shall we obtain the blessings both of the present and the future.—Oh! may we all obtain them, through the grace and beneficence of Christ our Lord; to whom, with the Father and the Holy Spirit be ascribed all glory, now and forevermore! Amen!—Chrysostom.

I LOVE THE SABBATH SCHOOL.

1. Because instructing my class is a happy employment. I find heart-felt enjoyment in it. I cannot name now all the sources of enjoyment it furnishes; one is, it gives me peace of conscience. I am doing my duty.

2. Because it is profitable to my own mind and heart. I must read and study to prepare for the lesson; my own knowledge is therefore increased. I must have feeling, and the right kind of feeling, to impart this knowledge to others. Hence my own heart is benefitted.—Moreover I learn much of the human heart and find many striking illustrations of Scripture passages respecting the sinfulness of men. I behold the operations of a sinful mind even when age and contact with a sinful world have not increased its depravity.

3. Because I am contributing to a fellow creature's happiness. I speak now only of time. The religious truths I inculcate, if they do not become permanent principles of action, will nevertheless impose powerful restraints upon wicked passions. They set vice and crime in its true light, and raise a loud warning against it. They will guard and shield the soul against ten thousand worlds evils, even if they do not sanctify.

4. Because I bear a part in bestowing blessings upon my country. The faithfully trained Sabbath scholar, as he rises to mature life, is an addition to the nation's moral wealth and strength. The million of Sabbath scholars now under instruction in our land will exert a happy and powerful influence over its dearest interests and its noblest destinies.

5. Because I am training immortal beings for eternal happiness. The truth I inculcate has a sanctifying power. It can make holy, being the quick and powerful word of God, and can qualify for glory. I aim at having this the result and the hope that it will be, in any case, is a most "blessed hope." I hope those whom I now instruct in divine things will sit with me at Jesus' feet in heaven, and be taught by him, while we joyfully sing the eternal anthems of his praise. These are my reasons. I do love, I cannot but love the Sabbath schools—Sab. School Treasury.

CHRISTIAN SENTENCES.

(Collated by Ralph Venning 1653.)

To deserve honor, and not to have it, is better than to have honor without deserving it.

That man's heart can be but seldom pure whose tongue is often impure; for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.

Men we try before we trust, but God we may trust before we try.

Concerning silence and speech he spoke well, who said, Not that which is much is well, but that which is well is much.

Some men there are who repent of their sins, but forsake them not; others who forsake their sins, but repent not of them; others (who alone are true penitents) repent of them and forsake them too.

They that glory in their shame here, will be ashamed of their glory hereafter.

Nothing engageth a saint to love God so much as this, that God loves him so much.

To practise the semon we hear, is the best way of repeating it.

That which many think their lost time, a christian often finds his best time, and that is, his thinking time.

As without faith it is impossible for works to please God; so it is impossible for faith without works to please God.

It is more to a man's honor that it should be asked, Why is he not honored? than, Why is he?

The works which many men do, honor God, when the men that do the works may dishonor God.

SELFISHNESS.—When every man is his own end, all things come to a bad end. Blessed were those days when every man deemed himself fortunate in the public success, & rich in the public welfare and glory. We want public spirit—we want public souls—those who shall feel and think, and plan and act for the public good. Too many are there that live for themselves, as if they were the commonwealth. All seek their own.

RELIGIOUS OPPORTUNITIES.—Religious opportunities are like the books of the Sybil—their number is constantly growing less, and their value more and more increases as fewer and fewer of them remain.

FOR PARENTS.

PARENTAL EDUCATION.

Parents are the natural guardians of their children. To you is committed the protection and education of those whom God has given you; and you will be accountable for the faithfulness or unfaithfulness in which you perform this duty. You have strong obligations and high duties to society, to your country, and to your friends; but much stronger, and infinitely higher ones to yourselves, to your children, and your Creator. Every man and woman has the care of his or her own heart and ways, and the hearts and ways of those who are helpless and ignorant, but yet committed to their trust. Parents may receive liberty and protection from government—they may receive comforts and enjoyments from society,—but from these sources they can receive but little aid in the primal education of their children. This is a work which belongs to them exclusively. To parents is entrusted the infant mind when it begins its immortal career.

But, from the supposed insensibility and incapacity of the child, during the three or four first years of its existence, parents often neglect the education, or the formation of the character, at that early but susceptible age. Many parents seem not to observe, that the infant commences acting and learning from the first moment of its existence. They see not that every look from its mother, every notice from its father, every animate and inanimate object which gets its attention, every sound and tone of voice, and family circumstance, are forming a character in the child, making impressions which will control and endure, and giving some kind of an education, either good or bad, which will influence the after-life.

Parents who do not perceive the wakeful attention and deep susceptibilities of early childhood, are not careful how they order their own conduct before their offspring, nor are they guarded in their expressions,—and thus insensibly form a character which all their after-instruction and good example will never change. Parents should know the capacities of their children,—ascertain what passion or propensity is acquiring undue strength, and how far the child is capable of receiving wholesome restraint and moral instruction. They should see that circumstances, apparently fortuitous, often have great influence; if not carefully observed and diligently counteracted, they will give to the early character a strong bias, which will be unhappy in its tendency.

The mother has the whole education of her children till they are three or four years old. During this time, she may stamp a character which will remain thro' life. She may so moderate the passions, restrict the appetites, correct the desires, and obtain such a government over the child's mind and affections, as to form the most decided character. After the child commences going to school, much of its time is still spent with its parents. The duties of parents are relieved by the teacher but a short time. The watchfulness and care of the parent, at this period, when the child is meeting with new companions, new modes of government, and an increased number of objects, which are exerting a strong influence, should be greater than before. Even if the privilege of a school be enjoyed, the education of the children belongs, in a great degree, to the parent.—By the parent, it must be commenced, carried forward, and completed.

Parents leave the education of their children too much with the schoolmaster.—You appear to think, that providing your offspring with food and clothing is all that is required of you; the education, the formation of the character, you say, belongs to the teacher. This cannot be so. Your example, companions, opinions, and expressions, will all unite with the teacher's instructions. You should, instead of trusting all to the teacher, co-operate with him, unite your labors with his, and ascertain the influence of the teacher and the influence of the school upon the child. Do not speak unfavorably of the teacher before your children, but teach them to love the instructer and the school-room, and at all times to be obedient. If your children are under good government at home, it will greatly aid the teacher in managing them at school; but, if the government at home is bad, it will be difficult for the instructer to control their conduct, or establish any government over them during their school hours. You often complain of the defective government of the teacher, yet do not perceive that the children are under no restraint at home. You, perhaps, have indulged them in every whim and desire; subdued but few of their vicious inclinations; suffered them to grow up disobedient and inattentive; and now, how can you expect the teacher to bring them under an orderly, respectful behavior at school?—Do not find fault with the teacher, till you have examined your own government, and ascertained how far you have fitted them for obeying or disobeying others.—Dist. School.

From the Sabbath School Instructor.

LABOR WITH ASSIDUITY.

It is very common for parents to say, when a child has been detected in a crime—"It is not because he was taught no better, that he did so, for no pains were spared in his childhood to bring him under the influence of religious truth." I have heard some such observation as the one recorded, when I knew that the parents were highly culpable for the conduct of their children. They had mistaken views of parental government and obligation, and suffered their children to grow up disobedient and unruly, when, at the same time, they believed they were training them up "in the nature and admonition of the Lord." I believe, and so must every one believe, who acknowledges the inspiration of the Scriptures, that, if parents are truly faithful to their offspring and bring them up in such a manner as the Bible directs, they will early see them walking in the narrow path to life.

The reason, why so many children grow up impenitent, I believe is, that connections are formed in early life, without sufficient forethought, or the least acquaintance with the duties of the high and responsible stations of parents. And instead of beginning with the dawn of intellect, to teach children their immortality, and their condition by nature, they suffer them to get considerably advanced in life, before they begin to perform those important duties, which are so requisite to lead them to the contemplation of divine things. If parents would but endeavor to be faithful, I am persuaded, that their reward would soon follow their persevering and faithful exertions. Do then parents resolve, that you will labor with more assiduity, and pray more earnestly for the salvation of those precious souls, which are committed to your care, and for which in a great degree you will be answerable when you are called to stand before the tribunal of your Judge. THE BISHOP AND HIS BIRDS.

A worthy bishop, who died lately at Ratisbon had for his arms two fieldfares, with the motto—'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing?—This strange coat of arms had often excited attention, and many persons had wished to know its origin, and it was generally reported that the bishop had chosen it for himself, and that it bore reference to some event in his early life. One day an intimate friend asked him its meaning, and the bishop replied by relating the following story:—

Fifty or sixty years ago a little boy resided at a little village near Dillengen, on the banks of the Danube. His parents were very poor, and almost as soon as the boy could walk, he was sent into the woods to pick up sticks for fuel. When he grew older, his father taught him to pick the juniper berries, and carry them to a neighboring distiller, who wanted them for making hollands. Day by day the poor boy went to his task, and on his road he passed by the open windows of the village school, where he saw the school master teaching a number of boys of about the same age as himself. He looked at these boys with feelings almost of envy, so earnestly did he long to be among them. He knew it was in vain to ask his father to send him to school, for he knew that his parents had no money to pay the schoolmaster; and he often passed the whole day thinking, while he was gathering his juniper berries, what he could possibly do to please the schoolmaster, in the hope of getting some lessons. One day, when he was walking sadly along, he saw two of the boys belonging to the school trying to set a brid trap, and he asked one what it was for? The boy told him that the schoolmaster was very fond of fieldfares, and that they were setting the trap to catch some. This delighted the poor boy, for he recollected that he had often seen a great number of these birds in the juniper wood, where they came to eat the berries, and he had no doubt but he could catch some.

The next day the little boy borrowed an old basket of his mother, and when he went to the wood he had the great delight to catch two fieldfares.—He put them in the basket, and tying an old handkerchief over it, he took them to the schoolmaster's house. Just as he arrived at the door, he saw the two little boys who had been setting the trap, and with some alarm he asked them if they had caught any birds. They answered in the negative; and the boy, his heart beating with joy, gained admittance into the schoolmaster's presence. In a few words he told how he had seen the boys setting the trap, and how he had caught the birds, to bring them as a present to his master.

'A present, my good boy!' cried the schoolmaster, 'you do not look as if you could afford to make presents. Tell me your price, and I will pay it to you, and thank you besides.'

I would rather give them to you sir, if you please,' said the boy.

The schoolmaster looked at the boy as he stood before him, with bare head and feet and ragged trowsers that reached only half way down his naked legs. 'You are a very singular boy!' said he; 'but if you will not take money, you must tell me what I can do for you; as I cannot accept your present without doing something for it in return.—Is there anything I can do for you?'

'Oh yes!' said the boy, trembling with delight: 'you can do for me what I shoud like better than anything else.'

'What is that?' asked the schoolmaster, smiling.

'Teach me to read,' cried the boy, falling on his knees; 'oh dear, kind sir, teach me to read.

The schoolmaster complied. The boy came to him in all his leisure hours, and learnt so rapidly that the schoolmaster recommended him to a nobleman who resided in the neighborhood. This gentleman, who was as noble in his mind as in his birth, patronized the poor boy, and sent him to school at Ratisbon. The boy profited by his opportunities, and when he rose, as he soon did to wealth and honors, he adopted two fieldfares as his arms.'

'What do you mean?' cried the bishops' friend.

'I mean,' returned the bishop with a smile, 'that the poor boy was MYSELF.'

FOR THE IMPENITENT.

THE GUILT OF NEGLECTING WARNINGS.

A serious man hardly passes a day, and never a week, without meeting some warning to his conscience something to call to mind what his great object ought to be through life. The longer we live, too, the more frequent, and the more striking these warnings become. The often told tale, the dropping into the grave of a friend, or relative, or acquaintance, or neighbor—can any be better calculated to put us in mind of the utter worthlessness of our own lives? Does it not remind us, when we choose to consider it with attention, that the heaven and hell of which we hear so much, are not things far away, but close at hand, soon to be made known to us by means of our own senses; and that these everlasting destinies, concerning which we are too apt to speculate as matters not to be settled for these many years may, in our own cases, as in the case of many others, be settled before 'omorrow, that Scripture says of man, that he is but a flower of the field, the experience of all ages may prove; and we know that the flower is as often cut down when in bloom as after it has withered and grown here. Yet with this knowledge brought so continually before us, we venture, day after day, to commit sin. But it may be said, events are not in our minds when we fall into these sins. So much the greater pity; is that events so serious, so important, should ever cease to have some weight upon a rational soul! Besides, the fact that our lives hang by a hair, is so frequently repeated to us, and the examples of that truth are so constantly before our eyes, that I fear we can never forget either the one or the other, without an exertion. We drive away the image from our minds, and then say that we could not see it; and that it had no influence over us. This is a very sinful neglect of God's warning voice: perhaps to the full as heinous as is the particular act of guilt, by which some one of his divine commands has been set at defiance.—Rev. G. R. Gleig.

THE POOR WIDOW.

In the congregation worshiping in the parish church of W., there was some little time ago a poor woman, whose zeal for the glory of God in the salvation of souls is well calculated to humble and stimulate the more wealthy friends of the missionary cause. She was very poor, and accustomed to earn her livelihood by hard labor, working for the farmers for about eight pence per day. It happened that a small annuity of about twenty pounds was left to her by some connection, after the receipt of which she became much interested in the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom. At the conclusion of one of the missionary meetings at W. she brought Mr. J., the chairman, the sum of seventeen pounds as her donation. He remonstrated with her, and refused to take so much, imagining, from her poor condition, that she could not possibly spare it. She persisted in presenting it. The next year, she brought no less a sum than twenty pounds which she had saved for the purpose, being the whole amount of her annuity for that year; having pursued her usual course of toil for her own maintenance; thus beautifully exemplifying a most literal compliance with the apostolic precept, "Let him labor, working with his hands, that he may have to give to him that needeth."—Eph. iv. 28.

In six years the poor widow's contributions had amounted to seventy-two pounds. Of her we think it must justly be said, "She hath done what she could." Consider, reader, whether the same can be said of you by Him who well knows your circumstances, and to whom you are no less indebted.

GOD OUR FATHER.

One of the most interesting features in the representations which the Scriptures give of the Most High, is his providential, his fatherly care of all the works of his hands. We profess to believe in God the Father Almighty—the Father in a peculiar sense, of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the Father also of the whole creation, and in particular of man; our Father, as he graciously permits us to call him. He not only at first made every living creature, but still continues to watch over and uphold them by the word of his power. He preserveth both man and beast, and "giveth food to all flesh," (Ps. cxxxvi. 25).—Holy David says, of the brute creation, "these wait all upon thee, that thou mayest give them meat in due season; when thou givest it them they gather it, and when thou openest thine hand they are filled with good," (Ps. civ. 27,28.) And with regard to ourselves, he is styled the Preserver of men; we are told that "in him we live, and move, and have our being." We are assured that "they that fear the Lord shall want no manner of things that is good;" that he hath said, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." Surely, my friends, if we believe these things, if we thus believe in God the Father Almighty, it will have a strong tendency to prevent our being over anxious and careful about worldly things. It will induce us, in compliance with the admonition of our Saviour, to feel persuaded, that he who feeds the fowls of the air, and clothes the lillies of the field, will not neglect to take care of us.

And thus also, when visited with affliction to believe that he is our Father, and that he is Almighty, will prevent us from murmuring and repining, and induce us to submit with resignation and cheerfulness to whatever he layeth upon us. The Scriptures assure us, that "as a father chasteneth his son, so the Lord our God chasteneth us," (Deut. viii. 5.); that "it is good for us to be afflicted," (Ps. cxix. 71.); that "he chasteneth us for our profit," (Heb. xii. 10.) If we really believe, that whatever befals us, happens by the direction or the permission of him, by whom, as our Lord assures us, the hairs of our head are all numbered, (Matt. x. 30,) happens by the will of God the Father Almighty, we shall suffer with meek resignation. We shall be disposed to say from our hearts, "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good;" (1 Sam. iii. 18); "Lord, not my will, but thine be done," (Luke xxii. 42). If instead of thus submitting, we give way to murmuring, and repining, and discontent, is there not reason to fear that we do not firmly believe in God's providence? Do we not, in some degree, deny by our behaviour the God whom we profess to acknoweldge?

From the New York Evangelist.

MINISTERS SHOULD WRITE FCR RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPERS.

A minister who was accustomed to use his pen for the press, being solicited to furnish an occasional paragraph for a weekly religious newspaper, replied, "I do not recollect that I ever wrote a line for a newspaper: I write for the quarterlies." No minister need consider himself engaged in any inferior employment, if he writes an article which, being inserted in a "folio of four pages," is read, in a single week, in ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand families. By his pen he preaches to an immense congregation whom his voice could never reach. Subtract from the usefulness of NEVINS all that he accomplished by his short pithy articles which he published in the religious newspapers, and what a blank would be made! But it is difficult for pastors to find time to write for religious newspapers. True; but why this difficulty? Because they have so much to do in building up the kingdom of Christ. It is this very multiplicity of incessant duties that furnishes pastors with practical thoughts, a variety of interesting facts, which are precisely adapted to the pages of a religious weekly periodical. But to find time to record them for the press—this is the trouble. Permit me to suggest a plan. Keep a scrap-book: in it note any thought suggested to your mind, or any incident having come to your knowledge, which you think might be useful if communicated to the weekly press. Open a sheet designated to be filled "For the Religious Journals." Turn to your scrap-book to see what ideas are there waiting for an introduction to the public. Give notice in your mental regions that in a few days the opened sheet will be dispatched to the press, and invite all thoughts which crave more publicity than you can give them with your voice, to make speedy application for a passage. The sheet being filled, put it into the post-office; always praying as you deposit the paper, that what you have written may do good. This is one way for ministers to find time to write for religious newspapers. That they do secure a proportion of time for this work, their people will have no reason to complain; for if they read religious newspapers, as every people should, they will share in the benefit.

PRAYER FOR THE SUCCESS OF THE CHRISTIAN PRESS.

This subject is not sufficiently remembered in our supplications to God. The subjugation of this world to Christ; the preservation of this nation from ruin; the saving of American youth from being destroyed by pernicious reading and contaminating [illegible]; the promotion of extensive and powerful revivals of religion; all these objects are most intimately connected with the success of the Christian press. Though the Christian press, in the most extensive sense of the term, should have a place in our prayers, I have now more particularly in view that department of it which is employed in this country, in publishing religious periodicals. Often, in public prayer, we should beseech the Lord to pour out his spirit upon the editors of these publications, and to grant them "largeness of heart, even as the sand which is upon the sea-shore." At the family altar also, such petitions should be oft repeated. In the domestic circle it will be proper that prayer should be offered especially for the editor of that publication, which the family regard as their religious family paper. Let this practice be adopted, and a family cannot read their paper listlessly, nor without increasing profit. How it must sustain an editor, to know that all the families which read his paper, pray for him!

J. R. J.

The earth never was designed for the Christian's home. It is a field in which he is sent to labor. Here he spends the heat of the day, and he cannot find his home until the evening comes and his work is ended. If this earth had been designed for the Christian's home it would have been made a very different place. It would not have been filled with so many snares and miseries, but would have been rendered a peaceful, quiet, holy habitation. But now God has prepared for him a better habitation, where nothing shall ever enter to disturb his rest, and where he shall feel himself for ever at home. The Christian only sojourns here like a wayfaring man to lodge for a night, but heaven is his home, where he has an eternity to spend. Eternity! eternity!! O, the boundless thought! How can we settle down in the dust as though we were always to continue here? How can we feel otherwise than as strangers and pilgrims on the earth?—Griffin.

MEEKNESS.—Meekness is so much the character of the saints that the most meek and godly are used in scripture as synonymous terms. The wicked and the meek are set in opposition to each other. Yet a little while and the wicked shall not be; but the meek shall inherit the earth. The Lord lifteth up the meek; he casteth the wicked down to the ground. It is, without doubt, principally on this account that Christ represents the heirs of heaven as little children:—Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven. Little children are meek, and though irritated, their anger is of short continuance. They do not cherish resentment, or entertain deep rooted malice. They are ingenuous and sincere; strangers to all disguise. They are pliant, diffident of their own understanding, relying on the instructions of their parents and teachers. They present, therefore, a fit emblem of the followers of the Lamb.—Jonathan Edwards.

AN ANGEL STANDING BY.—We read of a certain youth in the early days of Christianity—those periods of heroic sufferings, and heroic patience, and legendary wonder, to which I have already ventured to call your attention—we read of a Christian on whom his persecutors put in practice a more than common share of their cruel ingenuity, that by his torments (let those who will, or can, go through the horrible details) they might compel him to deny his Lord and Savior. After a long endurance of those pains, they released him, in wonder at his obstinacy. His Christian brethren are said to have wondered too, and to have asked him by what mighty faith he could so strongly subdue the violence of the fire, as that neither a cry or a groan escaped him. "It was, indeed, most painful," was the noble youth's reply; "but an angel stood by me when my anguish was at the worst, with his finger pointed to heaven." O thou, whoever thou art, that art tempted to commit sin, do thou think on death, and that thought will be an angel unto thee! The hope of heaven will raise thy courage above the fiercest threatnings of the world; the fear of hell will rob its persuasion of their enchantments; and the very extremity of thy trial may itself contribute to animate thy exertions by the thought that the greater thy endurance now, the greater will be thy reward hereafter.—Bishop Herber.

A PEOPLE WITHOUT A RELIGION.—There is in the Moluccan Archipelago a people called the Arafuras, who seem to have no religious ideas whatever. Mr. Bik, who visited them in 1824, found it impossible to convey to them the simple notion of a Deity. He says: "One of them, who had listened to me with particular attention, demanded of me where this all-ruling Being took up its abode. I answered that the Deity was present everywhere, not only among us, but in every plant that, through his goodness and power, he has furnished us for our food. This idea was too abstruse for the Arafuras; for one of them answered, 'Then this God is certainly in your arrack, for I never feel happier than when I have drank plenty of it.'

"What is man's history? born—living—dying—
Leaving the still shore, for the troubled wave,
Strugling with storms, over shipwreks flying,
And casting anchor in the silent grave."

THE SAINTS IN HEAVEN—You have seen in the morning, the earth coverd with dew; each sparkling in the sun's pure light, and like so many diamonds throwing back to each other, and to every eye, the brilliant hues of the rainbow! Such in heaven shall be the company of the saints; each indeed small in himself, but all like so many polished gems, sparkling with celestial brightness and reflecting to each other, and to all around, the glories of the Sun of Righteousness!—Tryon Edwards.

Illusions are the magic of real life, and the forfeit of future pain is paid for present pleasure.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

For the Register.

The patrons of the Seventh-day Baptist Jewish Mission are entitled to all the information on this subject that we are able to give them, and the Executive Committee of the Board avail themselves of the opportunity now afforded them by the Register, of presenting to the denomination what relates to this Mission since the session of the General Conference in September last, appended to the minutes of which is the report of the Board of Directors up to that period.

Since that report was made, two reports have been made to us from brother Maxson, embracing an account of his labors up to the beginning of the present month. We have endeavored to follow the plan of operations suggested and recommended in that report. From these reports the following is taken.

"The tract upon the prophetic character of the Messiah addressed to the house of Israel, then in the press was not completed until November. An extract from brother M.'s report will show the cause of this delay. He states "upon my return to New York from Brookfield, I found the tract still in the press. The printer had waited for my return to read the proof, and the sheets already struck off contained many errors, though of a trifling nature; but one entire sheet I rejected on account of its gross mistakes. Although I constantly urged the completion of this small work it was not until the 5th of November that I could obtain a few copies folded and stitched. From remarks made to me by my printer, who is a Jew of respectable learning and talent, I apprehend the work was delayed unnecessarily on account of its offensive character as being opposed to the general sentiments of the Jews relative to the Messiah, although he uniformly spoke of its charitable spirit. He repeatedly assured me that it would meet with a reply from some one of their ablest writers; and I as often expressed a desire that it would be replied to in the same spirit of kindness." This tract has been gratuitously circulated among the Jews in New York, and a package of them forwarded to St. Thomas, in the West Indies where there is a synagogue of Jews to be distributed among them by brother F. W. Stillman who has resided there the winter past. So far as we have information these tracts have been kindly received, and it is believed that they are read. A reply has been written and partly printed, but it is doubtful whether it will be published.

"On the 29th of September the Jews commenced their feast of Tabernacles. But it was not celebrated according to its institution, Lev. xxiii. 34. They observed it three days in succession instead of eight, with various ceremonies peculiar to the occasion, evidently aiming at a partial conformity with the law. They had the synagogue dressed with flowers and evergreens—had their bundles of Palm leaves, and blew their trumpets, and had a booth near the synagogue, constructed of branches of trees,—not for the purpose of dwelling in it, but as a matter of conformity to the law. Aside from these and many other ceremonies, the service was similar to their Sabbath service.

Nov. 5. "I visited, with Mr. Delmar as interpreter, the Jewish Rabbi from Jerusalem, and carried to him the contribution taken for him in Piscataway. He with his son, about 20 years of age, occupy a room in a private house. He was dressed in his Asiatic costume. He received me very politely, and when I presented to him the amount collected and informed him that it was a contribution of a Christian society, he seemed amazed and affected, at such respect shown him by Christians. He was much pleased with our being Sabbath-keepers. He stated he felt kindly towards Christians—that the Jews and such Gentiles as worship the same God, are brethren—that he would make our people known in Jerusalem on his return—he would pray for us at the holy sepulcher, and have our names inscribed upon his tombstone when he was dead. When I left him, he wished me life in this world, and in the world to come." His object in visiting the United States appears to be principally to see how it is with his Hebrew brethren. He is still in the city, and proposes to deliver a course of lectures on the advent of the Messiah by the aid of an interpreter.

Many interesting conversations have been had with the Jews on the subject of Christianity, from which their views and objections to this religion are plainly discovered. Among these are the following.

"I visited Mr. C. who claims descent from Aaron the priest. We had much free conversation on the subject of Christianity. One of his strongest objections to which is, that it requires divine honors to be offered to Jesus Christ. He insisted that this worship paid to the true Messiah would controvert the injunction of the first commandment of the decalogue, which forbids worshiping more Gods than one. He had great hopes for Jerusalem, from the success of the Pacha of Egypt over the forces of Turkey. He believes that when Judea is in the hands of the Pacha, he will give Jerusalem to the Jews."

"To-day I dined with a Jewess, and in the evening I took tea with another family of Jews; at both of these tables I was requested to ask a blessing. This is a liberty I have not before enjoyed in the family of a Jew. In conversation with this latter family, I pressed the importance of a prayerful consideration of the Christian doctrine as taught in the New Testament. By one of them it was remarked, that the Messiah, when he came, would make peace, but that Jesus (or the Nazarene as they called him,) said he came not to bring peace, but to make division, and to destroy the domestic union of families, alluding to Matt. x. 31, 35—that he claimed equality with God, which their people look upon as blasphemy. She believed it would be impossible for me to become a Jew, and equally so for any Jew to become an honest Christian. I had another conversation with an aged Jew. He hesitated not to call Christianity an abomination on account of the idolatrous doctrine of the Trinity. His mind was so benighted, that he could see nothing but inconsistency in Christianity. In presenting a Tract to a Jew, he said that if it asserted that Jesus is the Messiah, he would not read it; but if it was an enquiry upon the subject, he would peruse it attentively. When I assured him that this was the character of the work, he accepted it. This is the stone of stumbling, and rock of offense, to the house of Israel now, as well as in the time of the apostles; because they know not the Father nor the Son. In conversation with another learned Jew, he remarked that the Jews needed a much more spiritual Messiah than they are aware of, or expect. He further remarked, when speaking of the condition of the Jews, that he had visited a city in the kingdom of Morocco, about sixty miles S. E. from Tangiers, where there was a large body of Jews who were circumspect in the observance of the law—that they occupied an important section of the city, but that they were limited to one part of it—were not permitted to go out of the city, unless they go barefoot—they are not allowed to ride on horse-back, and are obliged to wear a certain kind of cap to distinguish them from other people. They were, however allowed to live after their own laws and to administer them to their own nation.

Brother Maxson, having received a request to visit the church in Berlin and he having a mind to visit them, we consented for him to go. He was absent about a month the past winter, it was not however at the expense of the society. After his return in February, he states that he has had a number of interviews with Rev. Mr. Frey, the converted Jew. Mr. F. has recently returned from an agency in Europe, under the direction of "The American Society for Meliorating the condition of the Jews," in which he has been employed for three years past. His agency seems principally to distribute his work "Joseph and Benjamin" gratuitously among the Jews in England and Germany. He speaks of distributing many in England,—Has obtained a translation in the German language, and published an edition of 5,000 copies. He has also had in view in his agency the establishment of a new society in this country rather than the promotion of the object for which the A. Society was formed. This Society, if I am correctly informed, consists only of a Board. Their charter of incorporation limits their efforts to settling, or colonizing such Jews as wish for Christian instruction and are willing to put themselves under their control. They have done nothing in this way, and probable will not. Mr. F.'s plan for a new society in this country is, that an association be formed under the direction of the Baptist denomination to provide for feeding, clothing, employing, and instructing in the mechanic arts, and in the Christian religion, such Jews as are willing to come to this country, and put themselves under the direction of the society for a certain period; and then to receive a certificate of their character, surplus of wages over the expense of board and clothing; and be at liberty to choose their own religious opinions for themselves. By Mr. F.'s references, it appears that this plan is highly approved in England and Germany, and that sufficient aid is secured in England to defray the expense of sending to this country all who wish to come on these terms. It also appears that there are many thousands in Germany who are ready to avail themselves of the advantages of the society whenever it shall be ready to go into operation. This plan of a Society in this country seems to be approved by many of the friends of the Jews in New York.

According to Mr. Frey's account there are about two million of Jews in Germany and Poland. That the Jews in Germany have abolished the rabbinical traditions and resolved to take the bible alone for their guide. That there have been three thousand Jews baptized into the Christian church through the labors of the London Missionary Society, and that there are about thirty converted Jews in the world now preaching the Gospel.

Mr. Frey is now delivering lectures designed for the benefit of the Jews, in a Baptist church in the city of New York on first day evenings; and he thinks some of the Jews attend to hear him; but it excites but little attention among them. It being the season for a stated meeting of the society, he is not without a congregation to hear him.

Brother Maxson still continues his labors in the city of New York, without any material alteration in the prospects of the mission.

The state of the Treasury has not warranted the Executive Committee to extend the labor to other and more distant places, which they think will be proper whenever their means will warrant it.

COMMUNICATIONS.

It appears from our exchange papers that an unusual mortality has prevailed among children, in different parts of the country for a few weeks past. In an article from the New York Express, it will be seen that the number of deaths at Long Island Farms recently, has been very large. In our own village also, the hearts of many parents have been made to bleed in consequence of their bereavements. These circumstances have elecited from a gifted correspondent the following touching lines which we welcome to our columns.—Eds. Reg.

THE DEATH OF THE YOUNG.

O lovely were they—for the "dew of their youth"
Lay light on the blossoms of infantile truth,
And the bright ray of hope, as it fell on the flower,
Gave strength to each promise, and wings to each hour.

But a cloud gather'd darkly, the tempest went by,
And the rushing of wings, swept the earth, and the sky,
And we knew the destroyer was out on the blast,
For the seal of his presence he left as he pass'd.

He breath'd on those bright ones—they faded and died,
The young mother's idol, the fond father's pride,
Too lovely for earth's scenes they pass'd to their rest,
Like visions of light, to the home of the blest.

Like dew-drops that sleep in the heart of the rose,
Like pearls, that lie low where the crystal wave flows,
Like gems their pure spirits are safely enshrined,
Oh! wouldst thou, sad mourner, their lot were like thine!

They sleep, and the voice of grief never shall wake
Their hearts to the echo' that bids thine own break,
They stand in the ranks of the glorified now,
Where bright wreaths of glory encircle each brow.

I look'd when they pass'd in their beauty away,
To the bosom of earth, and the cradle of clay,
And I thought it were sweet 'mid the freshness and bloom,
Of childhood's blest hour, to go down to the tomb.

WHAT ARE WE DOING FOR THE SALVATION OF THE AGED!

There are some aged persons who are without hope, and without God in the world. Perhaps they came into the section of country where they now reside, when it was new; they endured many hardships, and toiled much to procure the blessings which society now enjoy. It may be that they have laid up treasure on earth; but though their glass is almost run, they have not yet commenced laying up any treasure in heaven. What shall be done for them? We must plead with them to become reconciled to God; we must entreat them to come, even at the eleventh hour, into the vineyard of Christ. In our addresses to them, we must pay great respect to their age. Our manner of treating them, must be governed by this precept of the Bible—"Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honor the face of the old man," (Lev. xix. 32.) For years past, great and increasing interest has been felt for the young; a variety of efforts has been made to introduce them early into the Kingdom of Christ. This is right; but I fear we neglect the impenitent aged. Aged pious people are under special obligations to labor for the conversion of those of their own age. If a father or mother in Israel reads this, let such an one inquire—Who of the companions of my youth, yet remain on earth without a hope in Jesus? If you can go to them personally, and with tears beseech them to give their hearts to Christ. If you cannot see them face to face, write to them. If you are too infirm to use your pen, dictate an epistle, and employ the hand of another, your son, your daughter, or grandchild, to put your entreaties on paper. Those aged sinners, the associates of your youthful days, may hear you—and thus God may make use of you, just before your body goes to the grave, to save a soul from death, and to hide a multitude of sins.

DO YOU ATTEND PUBLIC WORSHIP?

"Not forsaking the assembling of yourselves together as the manner of some is."

We are social beings. Without society it is impossible for us to be happy. Place a man in a region where he is surrounded with every pleasure; yet there, if he found himself a solitary being, he would pine, and languish. Our wants, our mutual dependence, and our native instincts impel us to associate together.

The intercourse which we maintain with our fellows is a chief source of our enjoyments. But the ordinary commerce of the world, consisting in a circulation of frivolous intercourse in which the heart has no concern, is generally insipid, and is soured by the slightest difference in humor or opposition of interest. If we fly to the society of the vicious to avoid a wearisome correspondence with ourselves, the vexations we meet drive us again to solitude.

From virtuous connections alone may true happiness be expected. The existence of our species commenced in a state of union with God, and his moral image was impressed on our first Parents previous to their sinning. It is reasonable to conclude that no considerable improvement of a moral kind was made in society till the time in which it was said, "Then began men to call upon the name of the Lord." Gen. iv. 26. That is to pray and worship in a social manner, it being hardly probable that the devotions of individuals, as such, would have been thus noticed.

In taking a brief survey of the arguments in favor of a steady attendance on the public worship of God, we observe, that THE PUBLIC WORSHIP OF GOD MAY BE JUSTLY CONSIDERED ONE OF THE HIGHEST PRIVILEGES CONFERED ON MAN.

That the Divine Being should permit and invite fallen creatures to come into his presence, grant them a favorable hearing, and bless them with a sense of pardon, is amazing grace! Yet all "the weary and heavy laden" are called to the Savior. If all the riches of this world were offered a sincere seeker of happiness, the privilege of flying to God and communing with him in an hour of mental distress, would far outweigh them. The greatness of this privilege is enhanced when we reflect, that to extend it to sinful man, the beloved Son of God was made a sacrifice, and bled and died!

It is also an imperious duty to engage in the public worship of God. He has commanded it. "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God." It is also said, "they that are far from thee shall perish."

In a former dispensation a system of public worship was established, and nothing could be plead in excuse for the neglect of this duty. Three times in each year every male of a numerous nation, however remotely situated, was required to assemble before God for worship. And is the will of Jehovah less clearly expressed in reference to this subject in later times, and under the present dispensation? "It shall come to pass that from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, that all flesh shall come and appear before me."

The objects proposed in the establishment of divine worship, are of unspeakable importance to mankind. Among them we may reckon the removal of our ignorance. A true knowledge of God, and of ourselves, can not be attained if we shun the means of grace. He has instituted public worship as a medium of communicating a knowledge of his attributes and the way of salvation. It was in the sanctuary that David learned the severity of God's judgments in the end of the wicked. In the sanctuary the beauty of the Lord is seen, and the Christian is inured to those exercises which afford him an opportunity of contemplating the blessedness of holy beings already made perfect, and enjoying a foretaste of future bliss. To neglect this ordinance of God, however plausible our pretext may be if attention to it is possible, is not only to contemn his authority, but to trifle with the only provision made for our present and future happiness. It is to "love darkness rather than light." It is to choose death.

Let us ask professors of religion whether it is consistent with their vows, or duty, or interests, to neglect the house of God! What is the influence of your example?—You may have children. Would you see them grow up in the neglect of the means of instruction, and live and die in rebellion against God? If not, lead them to the sanctuary, where the gospel proves the power of God unto salvation. Have you unconverted neighbors? What inference can they draw from your inattention to the duties of religion? Must they not conclude either that your religion is defective in theory, or that you are lamentably deficient in the practice of what you regard as sacredly obligatory on you.

To conclude. However dangerous it may be to respect forms of worship and neglect the power of Godliness, it is quite certain that every person, living in the enjoyment of pure religion, feels so much interest in public worship as not willingly to neglect it.

To the impenitent, permit us to say, that the gospel is the appointed means of salvation. Will you—can you trifle with your own best interests—neglect religion—hate GOD, and accomplish your own ruin? If the services of the house of God have nothing in them to interest you, could you expect, without a change of views and feelings, to be happy even in Heaven? Do you say there are blemishes and imperfections in the church? And is that a good excuse for you to prefer the company of the wicked—to profane the day of God—to disregard the Bible—prostitute your faculties, and in the end lie down in sorrow? Oh! stop before it is too late! Turn to God while the day of salvation continues!

THE DIVINE COUNSELS.

The immutability of the Divine Counsels is a subject replete with interest to angels and men. The former as the sons of God exulted when a material universe was brought into existence by his word—to behold the permanency of his government, and the developement of the system of salvation. The latter, by his unmerited favor, are made the subjects of his kingdom, and the recipients of his unfailing mercies.

How full of comfort to the pious mind is the assurance that "the counsel of the Lord shall stand"—his counsels of love and mercy to his church—a church purchased by the blood of his Son. Well has an Apostle intimated that it is the purpose of God that the consolations of those who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before them, should be strong. Every believer feels that they are so. To the mercy and faithfulness of a covenant-keeping God, the christian and the church owe every thing. How sweet to remember his mercy in the forgiveness of sins that are past! How ravishing to the soul is a foretaste of that rest which is secured to the true christian by the Divine promises! He may truly say, in view of all he meets on earth to annoy him, while possessed of a hope so glorious, "none of these things move me." If faith gives him the victory over the world while a pilgrim here, He that hath loved him can make him more than a conqueror, confer on him an unfading crown, and raise him to a glorious throne. But how awfully interesting is this sentiment to the impenitent! Has God said "the soul that sinneth shall die"?—Has he said, that without faith it is alike impossible to please him, or to be saved? And, except a man be born again he can not see the kingdom of God? Then who can reverse it? Who will rise up to contend with Him or stand before Him when He is angry? And who would not rather seek his favor and prove his faithfulness, relying on his gracious word, "He that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out."

We have received the first number of the Free Will Baptist Missionary, a spirited little paper published monthly at Dover N. H. Our F. W. Brethren appear to appreciate to a laudable extent, the importance of Missionary enterprise. May success attend their efforts.

CORRECTION.—In last week's paper, in the article "on the structure and use of the eye," for "oplithalmy," read, oplithalmy. The error was in the MS.

☞ We wish the friends of the paper to use efforts immediately to procure us as many subscribers as possible. We can supply a few more with the back numbers. We hope those who received the first and second numbers who had not subscribed and who do not wish to have it continued, will return the paper to this office without delay. The papers are wanted for actual subscribers.

There is now in progress in Scott an interesting meeting, in which the different denominations unite. A number have been hopely converted. Many are anxious.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MESSRS. EDITORS—With mingled emotions of joy, and anxiety, I address you. This morning I took from the office, the "REGISTER" for the first time, and I am glad to see it, and am happy to say that I am quite well pleased with it after a perusal of its contents.

May the highest [illegible] expectations be realized in the Register by Editors, Publishers, [illegible] subscribers. Another circumstance is an occasion of joy to me again in looking over the REVIVAL RECORD, I observe, that in some instances, God is graciously reviving his blessed cause, and who can but rejoice? When I reflect upon the long night, that has been over us a people, the wrecked condition of our institutions, I must confess that feelings next to despair seizes me, and I exclaim "is mercy clean gone forever?" Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there? I would not distrust the goodness of God, but still I fear, and my daily prayer is, "O Lord revive thy work!" This brings me to the occasion of my anxiety, as intimated in the commencement of this article. I observe in the REGISTER, an extract from a letter, which I sent to Brother J. R. Irish, in which I expressed my fears that the Ministers of this denomination, were not in that state of spiritual labor, which it was desirable they should be. I have no objection that the quotation should apppear in the public form that it does in the Register, if it can be the instrument of good. But I am afraid that my ministering brethren, will think that I have not a very high opinion of them, or, that I am aiming to injure them and their influence. They may say "this surely comes with an ill grace from Br. Hull," and let me now declare, that it was not from motives of disrespect that those remarks were made. The facts are surely otherwise.

* * * * * *

My dear brethren in the ministry, let me ask you to look at the suffering cause of our common Lord. Or am I wild and imaginary when I view the cause as suffering? Look, for a moment at the number of vacant seats, on the days of the solemn feasts of Zion and inquire, if all were well, would it be thus. Again, visit our concerts and seasons of prayer, is there not manifestly a want of spirituality? Again, what is the condition of our Missionary operations.—Look for a moment at the Jewish Mission. I hear that the funds are exhausted. In our home Missionary operations, there is but little doing at present, as I am informed, & former Missionaries not paid! But this is not all, sinners all around us are daily being hardened in unbelief, through the deceitfulness of sin, and passing as with "eagle's flight," down to the gates of death, and brethren, where are we? Were we now called to render up our account, could it be said of us "well done good and faithful servants," while I write I am deeply affected, I tremble. Beloved brethren, is it not time for us to begin anew, in the great work whereunto we are called.

Your unworthy brother,
N. V. HULL.
Clarence, March 9th, 1840.

DEAR BRETHREN—My heart is gladdened by the arrival of the first No. of the Register, and while I peruse its interesting contents may I not fondly hope that no obstacle shall intervene to stop its onward course. From the deep anxiety which I have heretofore felt, and now feel, for the continuance of a publication in our denomination, I hope that every lover of philanthrophy will feel called upon to patronize and contribute to its support. Although the plan presented by me before the denomination last year failed; and although it fell to my lot to share liberally in the loss of time and money; yet it is my ardent desire that the present may be well sustained. The friends of a publication in the connection will receive my sincere thanks for the promptness with which they met the plan, although it has now ceased to be, and also for their kindness and hospitality.

Yours truly,
HALSEY H. BAKER.

REVIVAL RECORD.

Since I last wrote, meetings have been continued almost every day and evening in different parts of the town. The Spirit of the Lord has been poured out upon us abundantly. Immediately after the meeting closed in our Society, there was one commenced in the first-day Baptist Church, located near ours, and up to this date there have been one hundred and one added by Baptism. Last week I commenced holding a meeting in another part of the Town, with brother H. Mattison, a stationed preacher at Adams village, and on this occasion as before, the Lord has verified his promise, and made it a time of his power. The meeting continues day and evening, and more or less every day have found the "pearl of great price." This is the fourth meeting of days that I have attended the past winter. Pray for us dear brethren that we may still be blest in our efforts to build up the cause of Christ.

Yours truly,
HALSEY H. BAKER.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

IMPORTANT FROM CHINA.

Captain Western of the ship Morea, arrived last night from Macao, 8th Nov. He informs us that on the day of his sailing news reached that place from Canton that the trade with all nations had been stopped by the Chinese government. A vessel belonging to Macao had just arrived from Hannan Island, the captain of which reported that an American brig had been wrecked at that place; that near the wreck he saw two children in Chinese clothes who could speak English; that he took them to be Americans, and belonging to the brig. The captain further stated that the children pointed out their father to him, who had been made a slave of, and had a collar on his neck!

The papers by the Morea are no later than those previously received.

THE BRITISH EASTERN EMPIRE.

We copy to day an article from Blackwood's Magazine for February, on "The War in Affghanistan," which as it instructs, will powerfully interest all intelligent readers. We have nothing to do with the opinions, or party policy of the able writer.

The movements of the British in the East, which so over-shoot the ambition of all preceding conquerors, from Alexander down to Napoleon, are momentous signs of the times. The exciting state of affairs in China, and the eagle-eye with which Russia watches all that is done, to make these movements important even to our New World.

For the wild ambition, and the cruel love of dominion Great Britain exercises in the East, Americans feel no sympathy; but there is one consolation, that with British Dominion, travel British Laws, Religion, Civilization, aye, all the essential elements of that British Colonization, which has made us of these United States what we are.—N. Y. Express.

RELIGIOUS SUMMARY.

A converted Hindoo, dying, was asked by his wife, "Do you put faith in Christ?"—He replied "undoubtedly—undoubted—undoubtedly—undoubtedly I believe in him for salvation. Come, Lord Jesus! why dost thou delay? I am ready. Open unto me the door of life." His wife said, "Alas! you are dying! What will become of me? He replied "I have committed you into the hands of God our Father." She said "but what will become of our boy." He said "Christ our Savior will take care of him."

A HINT.—The Free Will Baptist Missionary states that Luther Palmer, of Norwalk Huron co. Ohio, has devoted himself and family, (his wife and two children) to the India Mission, and consecrates the whole of his estate to the cause, valued at FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS. He intends to appropriate his property to the purchase and support of a printing press in India.—Who will imitate his example?

The subject of organizing an American Baptist Sunday School Union is under consideration in the Baptist Record.

The number of Sunday Schools in Ireland is said to be 3,006; scholars 226,650; teachers 21,828. Of the boys 139,944 read the Bible; above the age of fifteen 45,944; not one half of them attend the daily schools.

It is stated on the authority of a Roman Catholic Bishop, of Philadelphia, that there are in the United States nearly a million of Catholics. Their number throughout the world is estimated at one hundred and eighty million.

It is stated by the American Baptist that forty-eight persons were baptized in the Stanton Street Church, New York, on the 6th inst.

A Baptist church has lately been organized in Texas by Rev. Mr. Huckens, agent of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society, consisting of nine members—five males four females. There is a prospect of further additions soon.

PERSIAN SCRIPTURES.—A new edition of the Pentateuch, translated by Archdeacon Robinson into the Persian Language is now in the press in England.—Gos. Mes.

NEWS SUMMARY.

The Greensboro N. C. Patriot says "that a man named William Kersey was lately burned to death in that county. He was intoxicated to such a degree that when he lay down by a fire, his clothes caught and he was unable to get away. He was literally roasted alive."

An immense amount of property has been destroyed by the floods at Lewiston, Pottsville and Harrisburgh in Pennsylvania.—The Ohio River is said to have been higher than in the great flood in 1832.

Peaches.—It is thought that there will be an entire failure of early peaches in New Jersey, most of the buds having been destroyed by frost.

Gov. Fairfield of Maine, has been presented with a cheese weighing 287 lbs. by Mrs. Esther Longley. The cheese having been made by herself.

Rev. Mr. Phelan a Catholic clergyman, has lately been very successful in advancing the Temperance cause in Lower Canada.

Hon. John C. Spencer, Secretary of State, has been elected Regent of the University in place of Hon. Jesse Buel deceased.

Gen. Thomas F. Carpenter, is the Administration candidate for Governor in Rhode Island.

Two young men who were sent by Gov. Fairfield to ascertain the nature of the operations near Tamiscouta, have returned and report that the fortifications are very extensive and as strong as any in New England.

By the schooner Callao from Campeachy, private letters have been received in New Orleans, stating that a division of one thousand men had left the city of Campeachy with a view to give battle to the Federalists near Merida, the capitol of the State. When the division came in sight of the federal army, they left their own officers and went over to the federal party.

The commandant of the Centralists, with his staff, returned to Campeachy without a single soldier in their company. Campeachy is left destitute of a garrison, there being in the whole place but fifty soldiers, exclusive of the officers who had been deserted by their troops. The city was in so bad a state of defense, and the artillery was so scarce and in such bad order, that it was thought that it would soon be taken into possession by the Liberal party. A majority of the people were in favor of Federal opinions.

The Canals in Pennsylvania were to be opened on the 20th inst.

The owners of the Great Western have reduced the price of passage across the Atlantic to $120.

Resolutions, having for their object the greater safety of steam navigation, are before the Legislature of Massachusetts.

The Liverpool Times was the first newspaper published in England. The first number was issued the 27th May 1576, being 264 years since. The publication is still continued.

The unprecedented mortality among the children on the Long Island Farms, has excited so much interest in the common council of New York that a committe has been appointed to investigate the subject.

The British Queen has arrived at New York. She left London on the 2d inst. and Portsmouth on the 3d. She brings papers to the day of sailing. The British ministry had fallen into the minority, and were expected to resign. The French ministry have resigned in consequence of the Chamber of Deputies refusing to grant half a million of Francs annually to the Duke de Nemours on his marriage.

Cheap Traveling.—Passengers are now conveyed from New York to Providence by the steamer Rhode Island, for $1; by Rail Road $3.

The U. S. Ship Decatur, Com. Ridgley, has sailed for the Brazil station.

Lewis Cass, jr., son of Gen. Cass, Minister to France, arrived in New York on the 17th inst., in the packet ship Emerald.—Mr. Cass is bearer of despatches.

The New Orleans Bulletin says, that Cotton which sold last year for 15 cts. per lb. is worth now but 7 cts.

Domestic Manufactures.—We have seen a number of pieces of Sheeting and Shirting manufactured at the Lexington Cotton Factory, Davidson county, N. C. It is a remarkable strong, heavy goods, and like the North Carolina Yarns, it is calculated, from its superior quality, to put a stop to the importation of Northern goods of that description.

A Cotton Factory has just commenced operations at Milledgeville, Montgomery county, N. C., owned by Edward Burge & Co.

The Phœnix Factory, in this town, has undergone a change from a Wollen to a Cotton Factory. Its machinery is now getting fairly into operations. It has looms sufficient to weave all its yarn.

It is needless to repeat, how heartily we wish success to every enterprise calculated, as these are, to promote the prosperity of North Carolina. The time is not distant, when our State, instead of a large purchaser of Northern cotton goods, will come into the general market as an extensive vender. She can manufacture cheaper than any State in the Union, and Faytteville can manufacture cheaper than any part of the State. As long as a Cotton Mill can exist in the United States they can flourish here. —Fayetteville, N. C. Ob.

DREADFUL MORTALITY AMONG CHILDREN AT THE LONG ISLAND FARMS.—We learn from an eye witness that the greatest distress prevails among the helpless little orphan children at the Long Island Farms. Up to Friday the 6th March, there had been according to the register, SEVENTY EIGHT deaths, since the 1st Jan. 1840, and there was then on the sick list nearly two hundred,—there were then three of the little sufferers dying. It is the opinion of our informant that this unprecedented mortality is owing to the want of milk and vegetables, and the bad quality of the provisions; the bread is both sour and musty. Facts like these ought to arouse the indignation of every individual in the community. It is distressing beyond expression, that these little orphans should be shut up to die. We trust that some gentleman in the Common Council will move an immediate inquiry into the matter.—N. Y. Express.

The sloop of war Preble is at the Portsmouth Navy Yard. The Concord sloop of war, in obedience to orders from the Navy Department, received at the Charlestown Navy Yard a year ago, has been ready for sea, at a day's warning, since last April—the Government having in the meantime fitted out several sloops of war, and forgotten that such a sloop as the Concord has belonged to the Navy. We are rejoiced, however, to see this movement—as the troubles in Canton render it important that some American ships of war should be sent in that direction without delay.—Mercantile Journal.

We regret to learn that Mr. Abbot Lawrence has been detained from his seat in the House of Representatives for several days past by indisposition.—Nat. Int.

SEVERE GALES.—We have before mentioned that the weather in January and February was very severe on the English and French coasts. Many ships have been lost, and several of our first-rate vessels, after beating about the channel for weeks, have been compelled to put into some port for shelter. The following is a list of packet ships which sailed previous to the Great Western:

FROM HAVRE.
Erie, Capt. Funk	sailed Dec. 24
Baltimore, Capt. Funk	" Feb. 1
Emerald, Capt. Howe	" Feb. 14
Sully, Capt. Thompson	" Feb. 1
FROM LIVERPOOL.
New-York, Capt. Barslow	sailed Jan. 7
Europe, Capt. Marshall	"Jan. 10
Roscius, Capt. Collins	"Jan. 13
Independence, Capt. Waterman	"Jan. 25
Cambridge, Capt. Bursley	"Jan. 30
Sheffield, Capt. Allen	"Feb. 1
Oxford, Capt. Rathbone	"Feb. 11
Siddons, Capt. Palmer	"Feb. 17
FROM LONDON.
President, Capt. Chadwick	sailed Jan. 30
Ontario, Capt. Bradish	" Feb. 15
Toronto, Capt. Griswold	" Feb. 17
Westminster, Capt. Moore	" Feb. 18
St. James, Capt. Sebor	cleared Feb. 17

The triumph of steam was never more manifest than in the last trip of the Great Western. While our packet ships have been buffeting the waves for six or eight weeks, the Western made her trip in sixteen days. Again during the severe gales in the English Channel, the steamboats have been the means of saving many lives and much property. The new steam ship President sailed from London for Liverpool early in January, for the purpose of receiving her machinery. While in the Channel she encountered a tremendous gale, in which she rolled away her foremast and would have gone ashore had not the steamer Royal William, which was crossing from Havre, gone to her relief, and taken her in tow.

NAVAL.—Orders have been received at the Charlestown Navy Yard, to fit for sea, as soon as practicable, the frigate Constellation, the sloop Concord, and the Preble. They are destined to the East India station, to relieve the squadron now there.—Boston Post.

We took a stroll along the wharves yesterday, and were surprised to find so few vessels in port. There could not have been half a dozen ships in the harbor of Philadelphia. The large vessels are in great demand, and freights are high.—Philad. Inq.

SUDDEN AND EXTRAORDINARY DEATH.—In a letter from one on whose statements a perfect reliance may be placed, the following account has been transmitted to the publishers of the Ledger:—A Mr. Clark, residing in Onondaga county, State of New York, had been observed for some time to live on terms of disagreement with his wife, giving the neighbors some reason to suspect that he had fixed his affections on another woman, viz., a widow who dwelt in the same village. Some time in last autumn Mrs. Clark died. Mr. C. often visited the widow's both before and after the death of his wife, and recently he became an inmate of the widow's dwelling, in the character, as we suppose, of a boarder. He had remarked to some of his friends, two or three months ago, that if this woman refused to wed him, he would drop dead at her feet. This prophetic assertion was literally fulfilled. On Sunday evening last, about 9 o'clock, he made proposals in due form, and was rejected, when he immediately fell dead! By direction of the coroner, the body was opened by a physician, and the sudden decease of Mr. Clark was found to have been caused by the rupture of a large blood-vessel near the heart. Powerful emotion may account for this singular event.—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

ACCIDENT.—On Thursday evening of last week, while Mrs. Elizabeth Gautier, a lady about forty years old, accompanied by a young man, were passing along the Bowery, opposite No. 170 1-2, where there had been recently a fire, part of the front wall of the building fell on Mrs. Gautier, knocked her to the ground, and injured her very severely. She was extricated as soon as possible, and carried into the next store, where medical assistance was obtained for her, and it is thought probable that she may recover. The young man who accompanied her, and who was almost at her side when the wall fell, providentially escaped any injury.

STEAMBOAT DISASTERS.—The Cincinnati Gazette publishes a list of steamboat disasters on the western waters during the last year. The sum total of losses is 40; of this number, 32 were an entire loss; snagged, 21; struck rocks, or other obstacles, 7; burnt, 4; burst their boilers, 4; run into by other boats, 3—10. There were snagged on the lower Mississippi, 11; on the Missouri, 4; on the Ohio, 4; on the Yazoo, 1; on the Red River, 1. It is remarkable that a majority of the boats were snagged on their downward trips. Lives lost, by bursting boilers, 39; by other causes, 6 Total 45. The amount of property destroyed in boats and their cargoes, is supposed to be not less than a million of dollars. Of this, the heaviest burden appears to have fallen on St Louis. The number of lives lost is much below the average of several years past.

Suppose a pint of powder to weigh a pound, the diameter of the earth to be 8,000 miles. It is required, to find how much powder the earth would hold, when formed into a hollow globe, the crust, of which should be one mile in thickness. A solution is required.

Here bliss is short, imperfect, incincere;
But total, absolute, and perfect There.
Here time's a moment, short our happiest state,
There infinite duration is our date.
Here Satan tempts and troubles e'en the best,
There Satan's power extends not to the blest.
In a weak sinful body Here I dwell;
But There I drop this frail and sickly shell.
Here feeble faith supplies my only light,
There faith and hope are swallowed up in sight.
Here love of self my bliss doth oft destroy,
There love of God shall perfect all my joy.
Here things, as in a glass, are darkly shown,
There I shall know as clearly as I'm known.
Frail are the fairest flowers which bloom below,
There freshest palms on roots immortal grow.
Here wants and cares perplex my anxious mind,
But Spirits There a calm fruition find.
Here disappointments my best schemes destroy,
There, those that sow'd in tears shall reap in joy.
Here vanity is stampt on all below,
Perfection There on every good shall grow.
Here my fond heart is fasten'd on some friend,
Whose kindness may, whose life must have an end;
But There no failures can I ever prove;
God cannot disappoint, for God is love,
Here Christ for sinners suffer'd, groan'd and bled,
But There he reigns the great triumphant head;
Here mock'd and scourg'd he wore a crown of thorns,
A crown of glory There his brow adorns.
Here error clouds the mind and dims the sight,
There all is knowledge, purity and light.
Here, so imperfect is this mortal state,
If blest myself, I mourn some other's fate;
At ev'ry human woe I Here repine,
The joy of ev'ry saint shall There be mine.
Here, if I learn, the world shall pierce my heart,
But, There that broken reed and I shall part.
Here on no promis'd good can I depend,
But There the 'Rock of Ages' is my friend,
Here if some sudden joy delight inspire,
The dread to loose it damps the rising fire;
But There, what ever good the soul employ,
The thought that 'tis eternal crowns the joy.

WILLIAM ORMOND.

MARRIAGE OF THE DEAF AND DUMB.

No word!—no sound!—and yet a solemn rite
Proceedeth, 'mid the festive-lighted hall.
Hearts are in treaty,—and the soul doth take
That oath, which unabsolv'd must stand, till Death
With icy seal doth close the scroll of life.
—No word!—no sound—But still yon holy man
With strong and graceful gesture hath impos'd
The irrevocable vow, and with meek prayer
Hath wing'd it to the register of heaven.
—Methinks this silence heavily doth brood
Upon the spirit,—Say, thou flower-crown'd bride,
What means the sigh that from thy ruby lip
Doth, 'scape, as if to seek some element
That angels breathe?—Mute!—Mute—'tis passing strange,
Like necromancy, all.—And yet 'tis well:—
For the deep trust with which a maiden casts
Her all of earth,—perchance, her all of heaven,
Into a mortal hand,—the confidence
With which she turns in every thought to him,
Her more than brother, and her next to God,
Have never yet been meted out in words,
Or weigh'd with language.
—————So, ye voiceless pair
Pass on, in hope.—For ye may build as firm
Your silent altar in each others hearts,
And catch the sunshine thro' the clouds of time
Did herald forth the deed—And when ye dwell
Where flowers fade not, and Death no treasur'd tie
Hath power to sever more, ye need not mourn
The ear sequestrate and the tuneless tounge,
For there the eternal dialect of love
Is the free breath of every happy soul.

MISCELLANEOUS.

WASHINGTON.

The person of Washington was commanding, graceful and well proportioned; his height was over six feet; his chest broad and full; his limbs long, well shaped and muscular. His eyes were of a light blue, and his countenance, in its quiet state, was brave, placid, and benignant. He generally appeared sedate and thoughtful; but when his attention was excited, his eye kindled, & his face beamed with intelligence and animation. He was not of very fluent speech, but what he said elicted general attention, & was always the language of his heart. He was not apt to aim at wit or humor in his conversation, but he derived great pleasure from these qualites in others. He was always affable, courteous, and cheerful, but at the same time possessed a dignity which inspired the beholder with the greatest deference and awe.

But if his person was commanding, so was his mind. Those extraordinary qualities which made him eminent were not, as in most cases, dimmed by corresponding weaknesses. He was great in every sense of the word. When the valiant Frederick of Prussia sent him his portrait, with this inscription, "From the oldest general in Europe to the greatest general in the world," he complimented only his military talents. But Washington was not more distinguished in the field than in the rest of his public career. Mr. Combe the phrenologist in one of his lectures during his late visit to the United States, observed:—I have often heard it discussed in my own country, and sometimes in this, whether Washington were really a great man, seeing that he did not in any particular direction show very extraordinary power. Now I have long been accustomed to adduce him as an illustration of that equable and harmonious development which gives sound judgement, sagacity, and a practical good sense. In what I now say, I appeal not to your national pride, as I have said the same things in my own country for years. Washington was one of the greatest men that ever lived. His temperament seems to have been sanguine bilious; his head large, and well adapted in every part—the moral sentiments and intellect reigning supreme. He had constancy which no difficulties could overcome, and an honesty of purpose and ardor of patriotism which no temptation could swerve, nor opposition subdue. He always regarded his country before himself; and in him there was no quality of mind deficient—no quality in excess; no false lights, and no deficient lights. He therefore gave to every thing its due weight, and no more. He was dignified, courteous, and just; brave, cautious, politic, quick to perceive, and prompt to judge; always acting at the right time, and in the right manner. Those who say that Washington was not a great man can merely mean that he displayed no one quality in excess—that he played off no corruscations; but he had that sterling worth—that daily beauty in the life—that force of character—that grandeur and elevation of the whole man, which renders him far more great and estimable, in my opinion, than the poet, the painter, or the orator."

It was even so. Wisdom, judgment, prudence, and firmness constituted the basis of his intellectual character; and he had no passions, appeties, or propensities which were not completely under the control of his moral principles. He may have deliberated slowly, but he decided surely; and when that decision was once formed, he seldom had occasion to reverse it. Courage was one of his most prominent traits, and whether in the midst of battle, or in the rage of popular excitement, he conducted with equal firmness, regardless of all personal consequences. If, as Dr. Channing observes, "he is the greatest man who chooses the right with invincible resolution, who resists the sorest temptation from within and from without, who bears the heaviest burdens cheerfully, who is calmest in storms and most fearless under menace and frowns; whose reliance on truth, on virtue, on God, is most unfaltering; then was Washington one of the greatest men that ever lived.

"His ambition," says Mr. Sparks, "was of that noble kind which aims to excel in whatever it undertakes, and to acquire a power over the hearts of men by promoting their happiness and winning their affections. Sensitive to the approbation of others, and solicitous to deserve it, he made no concessions to gain their applause either by flattering their vanity, or yielding to their caprices. Cautious without timidity, bold without rashness, cool in council, deliberate but firm in action, clear in foresight, patient under reverses, steady, persevering, and self-possessed, he met and conquered every obstacle that obstructed his path to honor, renown and success."

His moral qualities were, if possible, still more remarkable than his intellectual. Duty was the ruling principle of his life. He had only to find what was right, and that was always the path for Washington, let it lie through dangers ever so thick, or measures ever so unpopular. Truth, integrity, and justice were the pillars of his moral, as wisdom, prudence, and firmness, were of his intellectual nature; and the lack of these qualities in others at once destroyed his confidence. Weakness, follies, and indiscretions, he freely forgave; but subterfuge and dishonesty he never forgot, and seldom pardoned. His passions were strong, and when really roused the exhibition was withering; but they never broke from his control but for a moment, and then only in cases which demanded the severest rebuke.

He was educated in the doctrines of Christianity from his youth, and the principles of the Gospel seem to have been his guide through life. In his first military campaigns he was particular always to have religious service regularly performed in camp, and he reproved and forbade the vicious habit of profane swearing in his general orders. He always attended service at least once on the Sabbath when it was in his power; and we also hear of his fasting and partaking of the sacrament of the "Lord's supper." It was his uniform habit to retire to his library an hour before going to bed, and to repair to it again before sunrise in the morning, to commune in secret with his Maker. But it is not in these outward forms merely that we would trace the Christian character of Washington, but in the acts of his long and useful life, marked throughout with the most humble dependence on the Supreme Being in all times of trial, and the deepest gratitude in seasons of mercy.

Mr. Sparks well observes, that "if a man who spoke, wrote, and acted as a Christian, through a long life, who gave numerous proofs of his believing himself to be such, and who was never known to say, write, or do a thing contrary to his profession—if such a man is not to be ranked among the believers of Christianity, it would be impossible to establish the point by any train of reasoning."

He was charitable and humane; liberal to the poor, and kind to those in distress; an affectionate husband, a kind and attentive brother, and a dutiful son. Without vanity or pride, he never made his own actions the theme of his discourse. The grand-daughter of Mrs. Washington who was adopted by him as a daughter, observes that she never heard him relate a single act of his life that transpired during the war. His industry was as untiring as his mind was firm. He never trifled away his moments, but redeemed his time, with a vigilance which was not less remarkable than the other prominent traits in his extraordinary character. It was this unceasing diligence aided by the most exact method, that enabled him to accomplish so much.

But we cannot longer detain the young reader to explore the inexhaustible riches of the matchless mind of Washington.—"But if," as Mr. Sparks well observes, "he had one passion more strong than another, it was the love of his country. The purity and ardor of his patriotism were commensurate with the greatness of its object.—Love of country with him was invested with the sacred obligations of duty; and from the faithful discharge of this duty he never swerved for a moment, either in thought or deed, through the whole period of his eventful career."

"Such," says Lord Brougham, "was this great man—great, pre-eminently great whether we regard him sustaining alone the whole weight of the campaigns, all but desperate, or gloriously terminating a just war by his resources and his courage—presiding over the jarring elements of his political council, alike deaf to the storms of all extremes—or directing the formation of a new government for a great people, the first time that so vast an experiment had ever been tried by man—or finally retiring from the supreme power to which his virtue had raised him over the nation he had created, and whose destinies he had guided as long as his aid was required—retiring with the veneration of all parties, of all mankind, in order that the rights of men might be conserved, and that his example never might be appealed to by vulgar tyrants. This is the consummate glory of Washington; a triumphant warrior where the most sanguine had a right to despair; a successful ruler in all the difficulties of a course wholly untried; but a warrior whose sword only left its sheath when the first law of our nature commanded it to be drawn; and a ruler, who, having tasted of supreme power, gently and unostentatiously desired that the cup might pass from him, nor would suffer more to wet his lips than the most solemn and sacred duty to his country and his God required!"

He was indeed great in his undertakings and in his successes; but greater still in his virtues. His fame was acquired without guilt, and enjoyed without envy. Elevated to the most responsible and difficult positions, he passed through life, as it were, without committing an indiscretion or a vice. He obtained and established the independence, glory, and prosperity of these United States; and by his illustrious career won for himself a title before which that of kings and emperors sink to the dust—the dignified, paternal, and endearing title of THE FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY.—Arnold's life of Washington.

DEPTH OF THE OCEAN.—Many imagine that in the midst of our great oceans, the depth must be immense. But this is probably an error. It is reasonable to suppose that the bottom of the ocean is liable to the same inequalities as land; that there are chains of magnificent mountains, level plains, valleys, and hills, with deep ravines and caves. Many islands owe their origin to minute insects, which have raised their habitations, and their graves from the ground beneath, till they reached the surface of the water. This arrested the progress of substances floating on the surface of the water, accumulation and decay of which prepared it for the reception of mosses and plants of the lowest of vegetable life, which in their turn decaying, fitted it for other more perfect productions, till at length the mausoleum of the corals is covered with verdure, delicate plants unfold their blossoms to the sun, and graceful trees, and luxuriant forests bend their branches to the breeze, to become the habitation of animal life, and filled with the murmur of cheerfulness and activity. Other islands are the hills and tops of mountains appearing above the surface of the sea. The Peak of Teneriffe and other volcanoes in the midst of the ocean, as well as the occasional elevation of islands from the bottom of the sea, by means of subterranean fire, are convincing proof that the bottom of the ocean is subject to the same changes as the surface of the land, and that a communication exists between the ocean and continental mountains, by means of volcanic fires. These internal fires extend under the sea, from continent to continent, occasionally finding a vent in the midst of the world of waters, as in the case of Teneriffe and Stromboli; and at other times exercising their accumulated powers in the elevation of new islands, which however, generally find again their original level, when the fury of the flames has been exhausted.

A BEAUTIFUL SENTIMENT.—The late eminent judge, Sir Allen Park, once said at a public meeting in London:—

"We live in the midst of blessings, till we are utterly insensible of their greatness, and of the sources from whence they flow. We speak of our civilization, our arts, our freedom, our laws, and forget entirely how large a share of all is due to Christianity. Blot Christianity out of the page of man's history, and what would his laws have been—what his civilization? Christianity is mixed up with our very being and our daily life; there is not a familiar object round us which does not wear a different aspect, because the light of Christian hope is on it"—not a law which does not owe its truth and gentleness to Christianity—not a custom which cannot be traced, in all its holy and healthful parts, to the Gospel."

CHARACTER.—In society, character is the first, second, and ultimate quality. Never is a man undone who has not lost his character; but when that is lost, for all moral and useful purposes he is ruined. Envy and calumny will follow a man's success like his shadow, but if he is true to himself they will be powerless. Virtues may be misrepresented, but they are virtues still. In vain will an industrious man be called an idler—a sensible man, a fool—a prudent man, a knave. A good character is inherent. Its possessor may ruin it—no one else can.

EDUCATION.—The most valuable part of every man's education is that which he receives from himself, especially when the active energy of his character makes ample amends for the want of a more finished course of study.

There is nothing more fruitful of evil, and fruitless of good, than idleness.

THE NEW-YORKER.

THE publishers of the New-Yorker respectfully announce the commencement of a new volume of their journal on the 21st of September being the Eighth of the double Quarto Edition, and completing the Sixth year of its publication in the Folio or common newspaper form.

The New-Yorker is now so widely known as to render superfluous any detailed delineation of its character and objects. Suffice it here that the work is intended to sustain the reputation of a Weekly Literary Journal not inferior in ability and standing to any on either side of the Atlantic. About two thirds of its columns are devoted to the best Original and Selected Literature, comprising Reviews, Essays (Scientific and Literary,) Tales, Poems, choice extracts from New Works, Biographical and Historical Sketches, &c. &c. In this department, Critical Notices of nearly all new publications of interest will be given. The remaining columns will be devoted to a condensed abstract of the Political and General Intelligence of the day, Domestic and Foreign. Under this head the returns of all important Elections throughout the United States will be carefully compiled and compared with those of former Elections, so as to give a clear exhibit of the relative strength of each political party in the several States. All political movements of interest will likewise be briefly and impartially chronicled. In fine, it will be the general aim of this paper to be first useful and instructive, then agreeable and entertaining. The steady support through the last three years of an average of more than 8,000 subscribers warrants the belief that the conduct of the work has not disappointed the hopes of its friends, while it has secured the decided approval of an intelligent public. Such as it has been it will continue to be, with the additional aid already secured in its Editorial department, to which it is hoped that still further strength will be added by arrangements now in progress. If unwearied exertion and a fixed resolve to spare no labor or expense which may tend to elevate the character of their work can avail any thing, the undersigned are justified in cherishing a confidence that their journal will at any rate maintain the standing it has already attained in the public estimation.

H. GREELEY & CO.

The Empire State.

THE LARGEST NEWSPAPER IN NEW-YORK.

TERMS—Three Dollars per annum, or two copies for Five Dollars.

The publishers of THE EMPIRE STATE, having completed their arrangements for the Enlarged Series of that paper, will issue on Thursday, January 9th, the first number of the largest Newspaper ever published in New York. Having procured new materials wherewith to execute the printing in a style of elegance unsurpassed by any other newspaper—and having also secured such aid in the several departments, local and general, literary and political, of the paper, as to ensure its worth as a valuable FAMILY NEWSPAPER, the publishers offer it with entire confidence to the patronage of an enlightened public, and a full reliance upon their taste and discrimination for support.

We have chosen the title of "The Empire State," as expressive not only of our attachment to the interests of New York, but of the Union; for whatever interests New York in a great degree, interests the Union—whether in prosperity or in adversity.—And, as the Empire City is the great centre of business and commerce of the country—the point also where Intelligence from the European World is first received, and from which it radiates throughout the Union; so is New York, in many respects, if not in all, the most eligible point for the establishment of a valuable National Newspaper, as the medium through which shall be diffused to the States and Territories of the Republic, the earliest Intelligence, general and political, from every part of the world.

The mammoth size of our paper enabling us to present weekly an amount of matter contained in no other paper—we shall labor to present such a variety, original and selected, as will suit the tastes of all classes. The Politician, the Moralist, the Farmer, the Mechanic, the Merchant, and Professional Man, the Student and the Antiquary, the lover of humor, and such as would unfold a "Map of the Busy World,"—each and all may find amusement and instruction in the ample pages of the Empire State.

Some prominent features will be given to the paper, not found in any other. The utmost pains will be taken to present, at the earliest date, all important intelligence from every State in the Union—to collect and preserve Statistics and Important Facts, civil, political, and miscellaneous—to give full accounts of the proceedings of Congress, and of the Legislatures of the States—the best Speeches of distinguished American Orators and Statesmen—Memoirs of Eminent Men—Original Tales, Essays, and Poetry—Collections in the History and Antiquities of the Country—Improvements in Agriculture, and the Arts—Gems from the Current Literature of the Day—Notices of all New Works worthy of commendation—and Occurrences at Home and Abroad, commercial, monetary, or of whatever nature that can be of interest to the mass of readers throughout the country.

More, perhaps, we need not say—but submit our labors to the candid judgment of the public.

TERMS OF THE EMPIRE STATE.

ENLARGED SERIES.

The paper will be published on a Mammoth folio sheet, on paper of superior quality, and beautiful type.

I MUST PRAY IN SECRET.

That I must pray, is a moral axiom—it is self-evident—it needs no proof. It is as much the instinct of my nature, as it is the command of heaven. Prayer is my communion with God. It is my language of worship, as a man; of dependence, as a creature; of submission, as a subject; of thankfulness, as a needy being. As a Christian I find it "my vital breath, my native air." Without it I cannot live. I must pray; for if I do not, I shall spiritually suffocate; I shall starve and die!

But not only must I pray,—pray in the family, in the social circle, in the walks of business, winging my thoughts in aspirations to the heavens; but I must also pray IN SECRET. Some place I must have that I can call "my closet,"—some place where I can go away by myself, and shut out the world, and be alone with my God. Some place it must be, where like Isaac in the field, and Peter on the house top, and Daniel in his chamber, and the blessed Savior at midnight, I may "pray to my Father which is in secret." I must have a time for this duty, and a stated time, for if I have not, it will never become a habit; and if not a habit, I shall be apt to neglect it, and never will it be interwoven with my spiritual existence, as a part of my soul's life, and never will it have that power of association,—that current and glow of feeling, without which duty is never delightful. Often, too, must I attend to this duty; often improve the delightful privilege of private converse with heaven. An eminent statesman, with all the cares of empire upon him, used daily to retire for secret prayer; and Daniel, when prime minister of a kingdom, three times a day was found in his closet. They did not pray too much in secret. I had better pray more rather than less. Like them, like all eminent saints, often must I be found in my closet, with serious reflection, with self-examination, with the Bible open before me, in solemn, and fervent, and wrestling communion with God. Yes, I must often pray in secret.

I must pray in secret, for God commands it. "Enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret." This is God's command, and I may not, I dare not disobey it. "He seeth in secret," and if in secret I do not pray to him, he will be grieved and angry with me, while if I do, he, as he has promised, "will reward me openly."

I must pray in secret, for of all communion with heaven that which is secret is the sweetest. The dearest intercourse of earthly friends, is that which is most private, that which most shrinks from the gaze, the almost profaning gaze of others. Much enjoyment may the husband and the wife find in the general mingling of the social circle; but the highest of their social joys would be at an end, if there were no subsequent and private hour, when they could sit down together and talk over the incidents of that circle, and every thing that was of most and dearest interest to themselves. And so the Christian with his God. Public communion with him most richly may he prize and enjoy. But sweetest of all is his communion with him in secret; when in the sacred retirement of the closet, with no earthly eye upon him, he can pour out his soul in his solitude to his God. From the very instinct of his nature, of all prayer, that which is secret is dearest to him. Prayer, in its every form is his joy, his strength; but secret prayer is a luxury to his soul.

I must pray in secret, for, as an individual I have secret and peculiar necessities. I have secret and peculiar sins to confess, which it would be improper to acknowledge in public, and yet to God I can unfold and deplore them all. My temptations are peculiar, and to him I would go for peculiar strength. I have secret trials and sorrows which the world may never know, and yet to God I can pour them forth, knowing that he will never reveal them; knowing that he will sympathize with them all; that in all he will cheer, and aid, and direct me. If a parent, I can pray for a child; if a friend, for a friend; if a minister for each of my people according to their peculiar case. In public, joining as I there do with others, I can only say "our Father"—can only ask for general blessings. But blessed be God, in secret I can say, "O! my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me;" let this temptation be removed, this blessing be granted, this evil habit be broken, this trial, which rends my heart be taken away. In this, let the way of duty be made plain—in this grace let me grow; let this enemy be forgiven; let this friend be blessed." In such particular prayer, I find my nearest approach to my Savior, the clearest views of self, the most vivid light of God's countenance, the deepest sense of personal obligation, the mightiest strength, whether to receive, or to do, or to suffer.

I must pray in secret, for if I do not I shall not grow in grace. Of all the means of spiritual growth, none do I find more efficient or blessed than this. In secret communion with God, I feel as if He were personally with me, and this gives [illegible] and [illegible] ness to every obligation. [illegible] if ever, I would, ne[illegible] [illegible] never, do I earnestly strive for [illegible]. The thought that I have [illegible] I find [illegible] [illegible] has less power, the world less influence. Coming with Daniel from the closet, with David I am able to say, "My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed." Mine is that "calm and heavenly frame, which elevates above the world, and fills with the spirit of Jesus, and girds for every holy effort. Coming from the closet, then, if ever, am I firm in duty, cheered under sorrow, strengthened against sin. And so with every child of God. Never was there one who loved his closet, who lived much in it, that was not a spiritual, a growing Christian.

I must pray in secret, for if I sin by neglecting my closet, I shall soon be left to other sins. Declension, inconsistency, formality, backsliding, they all begin in the closet, in the neglect of secret prayer. "Cast" ourselves "away from God's presence," and he will "take his Holy Spirit from us." Going away from him, neglecting his society, practically despising communion with him, he will leave us. And left of him, spiritual darkness, if not spiritual death, will be upon us. Neglect the closet, and next the family altar will be neglected, and then the circle of social prayer, and then the Bible, and then perhaps the sancturay and all the means of grace. Neglect the closet, and you know not where or how far you may wander; you know not, when, if, ever, you will return. Neglect the closet, and soon you will abandon it; abandon it, and soon you will be left of God to dark, if not damning sin—perhaps to endless ruin!

I must, then, I MUST pray in secret; statedly, frequently, earnestly must I do it. God enjoins it. My highest enjoyment, and my individual and peculiar necessities demand it. I must do it, that I may grow in grace, that I may not decline in spirituality, that I may not wander from God. To pray in secret! It is a solemn duty, a glorious and blessed privilege, thus to hold a converse with the Most High; as a child with a Father, as a friend with a friend, thus to commune with him, and breathe his spirit, and receive his impress, his image upon my heart! O! may I ever prize—may I ever improve it! By God's grace, I will. God's grace, God's Spirit assisting me, I will pray in secret. Ever and faithfully will I do it, till from prayer on earth, I am raised to praise in HEAVEN! T. E.

EIGHT FUNDAMENTAL ERRORS IN MILLER'S THEORY OF THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

For the benefit of those who have not studied Miller's theory, we point out the following fundamental errors:—

1. He dates the vision of the oppression of the church of God, Jewish and Christian, from the edict of Artaxerxes, given B. C. 457, to Ezra, to build Jerusalem, and restore the Jewish state; which was so effectual, that Jerusalem and its temple flourished, with slight interruption, for above 500 years, until destroyed by the Romans, A. D. 70.

How preposterious to date duration of the "sanctuary's being trodden under foot," from an edict thus to build it up!

2. Mr. Miller dates the assumption of Roman supremacy, from A. D. 534; whereas, all standard histories agree, that the Emperor Phocas conferred upon the Bishop of Rome the title of "Universal Bishop," A. D. 606.

3. He declares that Papacy has lost its civil sword and triple crown, since A. D. 1798! Whereas, the Pope of Rome is now just as much an absolute sovereign as any one in Europe.

4. He makes Michael (Dan. xii. 1) to mean Christ, who is about "to stand up" to judge the world, and raise the dead; and his theory cannot subsist without this interpretation; but St. Jude, verse 9th, informs us, that Michael is an archangel.

Thus, with the main pillar, the whole system comes to the ground.

5. He makes out two days of judgment and resurrection, one thousand years apart; one for the righteous, and the other for the wicked.

6. He denies that all Israel will be saved before the end of the world, against the uniform and repeated declarations of the prophets from the beginning.

7. He denies that the gospel will be propagated and become triumphant throughout the world before the resurrection.

8. He declares in one place in his book, that Christ has greatly revived the church since the downfall of Napolean, and has roused her to the missionary work, so that she has published the scriptures in one hundred and fifty different languages; while in another place he considers the Laodicean church, which the Savior declared to be lukewarm, and ready to be spued out of his mouth, to be the prophetic emblem and type of Protestant Christianity in these days! See his 17th lecture, and a part of the 10th, 2d edition.

Other errors might be shown; some of them fundamental, and others incidental; such as that the day of grace will close, the Turkish empire will come to an end, and that there will be an unparalleled time of trouble in 1939; each of which catastrophes is an independent conclusion from independent chains of argument. But thus much must for the present suffice.

It has been conceded by Mr. Miller's friends, that revivals of religion have followed his preaching, in almost every place where he has been. This may be true; but it does not follow that his explanations of the prophecies have conduced to this. He is in the practice, and he is certainly to be commended for it, of closing his lectures with powerful appeals to the consciences of his audience, in relation to the salvation of their souls. These exhortations and warnings are heart-searching. They are very much in the spirit and style of Whitefield's sermons; and coming from a man who evinces the sincerity of his belief, in the solemnity, ardor and earnestness of his manner, it is no wonder that persons are convicted. They would be, the prophets out of the question.

We give our readers specimens of these eloquent appeals. They are the closing paragraphs of his 11th and 12 lectures:

"Be warned! Repent! Fly, fly for succor to the ark of God—to Jesus Christ—the Lamb which once was slain, that you might live—for he is worthy to receive all honor, power and glory. Believe and you shall live. Obey his word, his spirit, his calls, his invitations. There is no time for delay. Put it not off, I beg of you: no, not for a moment. Do you want to join that heavenly choir, and sing the new song? Then come in God's appointed way. Repent. Do you want a house, not made with hands, eternal in the heavens? Then join in heart and soul this happy people whose God is the Lord. Do you want an interest in the new Jerusalem, the beloved city? Then set your face as a flint Zionward. Become a pilgrim in the good old way. 'Seek first the kingdom of God,' says Christ, 'and then all these things shall be added unto you.'"

But you, my impenitent friends, who have never wept, nor confessed your sins to God—who have been more anxious to have your names written in the book of fame, of wordly honor, of the riches of this world, than in the Book of Life—remember, you to will weep when all heaven is silent. When the last seal is broken—then you will see the book, and your name blotted out! Then you will weep, and say—Once my name was there. I had a day of probation. Life was proffered. But I hated instruction, I despised reproof, and my part is taken from the Book of Life! Farewell happiness, farewell hope! Amen."

But in relation to the prophecies, Mr. Miller is in an error. We say plainly—and if there is anything to risk in the way of reputation we risk it—that the events predicted by him to take place in 1834, will not take place; or to come a little nearer home, that those predicted to take place next August, will not take place. And what will be the mortification of Mr. Miller, and those who have embraced his opinions, when next autumn arrives, and everything goes on as heretofore? Will they then frankly confess their error, and acknowledge their delusion? What does experience say on this question? It says that most men who have tenaciously adhered to, and zealously defended a system, have too much pride for this. They prefer, if possible, to avoid the mortificaton of an humble confession, and cast about to find somebody or something upon which they may shift the blame. And upon what will Mr. Miller cast the blame? Why, upon the Bible of course. He verily believs, that if the Bible teaches anything, it teaches the system he has been seven years preaching, and sixteen years studying. Now, if these events do not happen as predicted, what will be the effect? Why that the Bible does not teach any thing. We have no doubt that a large portion of Mr. Miller's adherents will cherish this infidel sentiment. And would not this be consistent with their present belief?

We hope that God will overrule these things for his glory; but the prospect now is, that Mr. Miller's Lectures will do infinitely more harm than good.

From the Evangelist.

SPEAK TO THAT YOUNG MAN.

He is a professor of religion, but not active in the service of his Divine Master. He is not instant in season and out of season. Tell him to search the scriptures, and therefrom learn his duty, and then do it. When the Rev. Mr———was a young man, he was constantly seeking opportunities for doing good. Wherever he went, he always carried with him a good supply of religious tracts. Once, while a member of college, he spent his vacation in a town upon the mountain's side, where God was graciously pouring out his Spirit, and converting sinners to himself. Near the close of one day, he called at a house where was to be held an evening meeting. As he entered, said the good woman of the house to him, "How glad I am to see you! Now, I want that you should take a horse from the stable, and ride up that hill yonder, where the sun is setting—leave the road on the other side of the hill, take a by-path through the woods, and there you will find a family of impenitent young people, whom you can persuade to come out to meeting, and you may be the means of the salvation of their souls." Urged on by this praying woman, he went; and as he was about to leave the main road, he said to a little boy, "If you will let down those bars for me, I will give you a tract." The first he took from his hat was The Barren Fig Tree, which the boy received with sparkling eyes, and ran to his house. The young man went on, found the family of which he was in pursuit, and persuaded three of the members to attend the meeting, all of whom were that night deeply convicted of sin, and soon after hopefully converted to God.

Some weeks after this, as this same young man was wending his lonely way back to college, while passing one of those dark ravines of the Green Mountains, where precipice hangs on precipice, upon either side of you, up to a wondrous height, exciting in the pious mind adoring views of the great Creator, he fell in company with a man, whose whitened locks bespoke him of advanced age. "I am happy to meet you, my aged friend," said the youth, "in this sequestered spot. I was adoring the wisdom of Him who has scooped out this deep valley between these towering rocks, seemingly on purpose to make a comfortable passage from one side of the mountain to the other. I trust that for many long years you have found great pleasure in contemplating the wonderful works of Jehovah, and in adoring him for the riches of his goodness." "No, my young friend," said the old man, "it is not so. I am an old sinner, and for many long years have been nothing but a barren fig-tree. And God put it into the mind of somebody to make a tract on that subject, on purpose for me; and a young man, a few weeks ago, gave it to my little boy, and then rode right down into the woods; and what has become of him I cannot tell. But the tract brought up before me all the sins that I ever committed. I felt that I deserved to be cut down and cast into the fire. But I cried to God to have mercy upon me, a poor old sinner. And now I hope, that for Christ's sake he has forgiven my sins, and I have felt very happy in my soul for a few days past. And it has got hold of my family too. My children were deeply convicted, hearing their poor old wicked father try to pray; and now, one son and two daughters can rejoice and pray with me. O, how I wish I knew who made that tract, and who that young man was that give it to my little boy!" "Give God the glory," said the youth; "there is no praise due to man." "Well, we do give God the glory; and we sing his glory every day; and we are now a happy family, I can tell you. And I am resolved to bear some fruit the remainder of my days, and no longer be a barren fig-tree."

After much more conversation upon that glorious theme, which now occupied all the old man's thoughts, they parted; and the young man went on his way, praising God that he had made him the honored instrument of the conversion of so many souls, by that one short tour.

O then speak to that young man, who is only a mere nominal professor, having the form of godliness without the power. Tell him to furnish his hat or pockets with religious tracts, and to seek opportunities for giving them away. O, wake him from his lethargy! Tell him of that Savior, who, though rich, for his sake became poor. Remind him of his covenant vows, of his great responsibility; of the interests of the church, and of the perishing condition of impenitent sinners; of the luxury of doing good, and of the glory which awaiteth those, hereafter, who turn many to righteousness! Urge him—by the love of a bleeding Savior, by the glory of his kingdom, by the ceaseless joys of heaven, and the untold horrors of hell—to awake out of sleep, and to engage with a holy and untiring zeal in the cause of his God. Sleep a little longer, and he may at last have the portion of the unprofitable servant, with hypocrites and unbelievers.

From the Oberlin Evangelist.

GOD'S LOVE FOR ZION.

TEXT.—Ps. 87 : 2 : The LORD loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob.

Yes, the Lord loves the gates of Zion, even of his spiritual Zion. Most abundantly has he declared this, and with most rich and cheering similitudes has he represented it. "For thy Maker is thine husband; the LORD of hosts is His name; and thy Redeemer the Holy One of Israel: The God of the whole earth shall He be called. For the LORD hath called thee as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit, saith thy God. For a small moment have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee. In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the LORD thy Redeemer." Isa. 54: 5—8. O what love! what kindness; what promises! How precious and touching is the antithesis of future good over against past affliction. A small moment of forsaking, and everlasting kindness of the ingathering; a little wrath in the hiding of His face, but great mercies and everlasting favor in the final shining forth of that face on Zion, like the sun in his strength and glory.

Verily, the Lord loves Zion. How amply has He proved this by His ceaseless care of her interests! Often, indeed, both in ancient days, and in all days, has Zion passed through the fires of tribulation, and the deep waters of adversity; but when has God utterly forsaken her? If ever, it was, as Himself says, for small moment only. Zion has never lacked foes. Oft times have they been many and strong, and sure of victory. They have thought to crush the infant in the cradle—but God took care. They have thought to root out the Church, name and memorial, from under heaven—but God has made her live. They have tried upon her, shame, and fear, and faggot; but all in vain. God has been with her in the fiery furnace. The history of God's care of Zion, and of her victories in the strength of her God, is wonderful. It shows that of a truth God has loved the gates of Zion more than all else that is fair and lovely on this footstool of His throne.

Then God does love His Zion. Let the thought dwell in my soul as a living reality and precious consolation. Men may revile and hate her. They may cast out her name as evil, and mock at her hopes, and laugh to scorn her doctrines, her labors, her character, and even her Lord; but what have I to fear, or what cause have I for shame? Let it ever be enough for me that Zion has one Friend on high.

The Lord loves Zion. Would that all her professed children loved her too. But alas! here are some of her heaviest trials, when I see how many love the world so much that the love of Christ cannot be in them; and how cold is the love for Zion in many others: when I mark how little, almost to nothing, they say or do for Zion's Lord, I am deeply grieved and discouraged. With heavy sighs I ask, Will Zion ever arise and shine; can her God ever have mercy on her, and appear in his glory, to build up her broken walls and crumbling palaces? I have one hope, I know the Lord loves Zion.

Yes, and let it animate my faith in prayer; for I know that I have no need to move the sympathy of God as if He felt not for His crucified Son. He does feel for these interests incomparably more than I do, or ever can. Alas for Zion! if there were not one on high who loves her with more constancy and ardor and strength than her sons and daughters on earth do.

It is a precious truth that God loves Zion, and well may it strengthen my hands to labor for her glorious enlargement. For labor done for Zion shall not be in vain. Human enterprises may come to naught, and disappointment crush the fondest hopes of mortals. But the great enterprise of redeeming a world from sin and bringing it to the feet of Jesus, shall not fail. How can it, if the Lord loves Zion, and has given her His promise, that with everlasting kindness, He will gather her, and to His Son "will give the heathen for His inheritance?"

Yet again, let me remember that the Lord loves Zion, and let the recollection be my solace as I sympathise with all her sorrows and despondings. For she has other friends who sympathise in all she suffers. Yes, she has noble friends, and strong deliverers.

And amid a world whose scorn is sometimes poured on Zion's people, it may well be their consolation and more than consolation that in all their love for Zion, they feel with God and Christ and all the holy.—They hold communion in this sympathy with the infinite God. His heart feels like theirs for Zion's interests and Zion's children. And who would not be happy in sympathy with God, though the universe besides were against him? Who would not deem it the highest glory, and a privilege well bought with a martyr's stake, to have the sweet consciousness of feeling as God feels in the love He bears to Zion?—Reader, this privilege and glory may become yours—but is it now? H. THE INDIAN,

On beholding Washington at Prayer in the Forest.

THE Indian stood in the forest shade,
He heard a murmured tone;
Upon the ground his ear he laid
To hear who talked alone.

He listened still—no voice was heard
Save that low, earnest tone;
He turned him round—'list, warriors list,
The white man talks alone.'

'He talks unto our Spirit Great,
Behold his hands are spread;
You, warriors, you this white man hate—
His blood ye shall not shed.'

Thus spoke the chieftain, bold and high,
The dark band stood around,
A fearful light shone in each eye—
They stood in awe profound.

The white man ceased—he turned away
Unconscious who was there;
The red man learned a lesson deep
In that lone bower of prayer.

NATURE AND DESIGN OF CHRISTIANITY.

The wisdom of mankind has, for several ages of the world, been enquiring into the nature of man, and the nature of the world in which he is placed.

The wants and miseries of human nature, and the vanity of worldly enjoyments, have made it difficult for the wisest men to tell what human happiness was, or wherein it consisted.

It has pleased the infinite goodness of God, to satisfy all our wants and enquiries by a revelation made to the world by his Son Jesus Christ.

This revelation has laid open the great secrets of providence from the creation of the world, explained the present state of things, and given man all the information that is necessary to quiet his anxieties, content him with his condition, and lead him safely to everlasting rest and happiness.

It is now only necessary, that the poor wisdom of man do not exalt itself against God, that we suffer our eyes to be opened by him that made them, and our lives to be conducted by him, in whom we live, move, and have our being.

For light is now come into the world, if men are but willing to come out of darkness.

As happiness is the sole end of our labors, so this divine revelation aims at nothing else.

It gives us right and satisfactory notions of ourselves, of our true good and real evil; it shows us the true state of our condition, both our vanity and excellence, our greatness and meanness, our felicity and misery.

Before this, man was a mere riddle to himself, and his condition full of darkness and perplexity. A restless inhabitant of a miserable disordered world, walking in a vain shadow, and disquieting himself in vain.

But this light has dispersed all the anxiety of his vain conjectures; it has brought us acquainted with God, and by adding heaven to earth, and eternity to time, has opened such a glorious view of things, as makes man, even in his present condition, full of a peace of God which passes all understanding.

This revelation acquaints us, that we have a spirit within us, that was created after the divine image, that this spirit is now in a fallen corrupt condition, that the body in which it is placed is its grave, or sepulchre, where it is enslaved to fleshly lusts, blinded with false notions of good and evil, and dead to all taste and relish of its true happiness.

It teaches us, that the world in which we live is also in a disordered irregular state, and cursed for the sake of man; that it is no longer the paradise that God made it, but the remains of a drowned world, full of marks of God's displeasure, and the sin of its inhabitants.

That it is a mere wilderness, a state of darkness, a vale of misery, where vice and madness, dreams and shadows, variously please, agitate, and torment the short miserable lives of men.

Devils also, and evil spirits, have here their residence, promoting the works of darkness, and wandering up and down seeking whom they may devour.

So that the condition of man, in his natural state, seems to be like that of a person sick of a variety of diseases, knowing neither his distempers nor his cure, and unhappily enclosed in some place where he could hear, or see, or feel, or taste of nothing, but what tended to inflame his disorders.

The excellency therefore of the Christian religion appears in this, that it puts an end to this state of things, blots out all the ideas of worldly wisdom, brings the world itself to ashes, and creates all anew. It calls man from an animal life and earthly societies, to be born again of the Holy Ghost, and be made a member of the kingdom of God.

It crushes into nothing the concerns of this life, condemns it as a state of vanity and darkness, and leads man to happiness with God in the realms of light.

It proposes the purification of our souls, the enlivening us with the divine spirit; it sets before us new goods and evils, and forms us to a glorious participation of the divine nature.

This is the one sole end of Christianity, to lead us from all thoughts of rest and repose here, to separate us from the world and worldly tempers, to deliver us from the folly of our passions, the slavery of our own natures, the power of evil spirits, and unite us to God, the true fountain of all real good. This is the mighty change which Christianity aims at, to put us into a new state, reform our whole natures, purify our souls and make them the inhabitants of heavenly and immortal bodies.

It does not leave us to grovel on in the desires of the flesh, to cast about for worldly happiness, and wander in darkness and exile from God, but prepares us for the true enjoyment of a divine life.—William Law.

THOUGHTS AMONG THE DEAD.

It was evening when I found myself within a church yard, an evening the most delightful of the year, an evening in spring. The sun had descended, the light of day had gradually faded away, and one by one appeared the twinkling stars, shedding a mild and silvery lustre over all the loveliness of nature. I had purposely directed my steps thither, and as I approached the resting place of the dead a thousand tender recollections were revived—recollections of the young and beautiful, who had been my playmates in childhood, whose countenances once glowed with health—to whose eyes Friendship's holy light gave a brilliancy. These were looking forward to long life with all the ardency of youthful feeling, but they had withered like the last leaves of autumn, and in an unexpected hour had taken the last look upon the beauties of earth. They were now quietly sleeping beneath the green sod, alike unmoved by love or sorrow.

As I stood beside their graves, while all around being hushed in peace, seemed to inspire a solemn and deathlike stillness and to awaken in the heart calm and holy reflections, I thought upon existence. I asked 'What is our life? The word of God replied, "It is even a vapor that appeareth for a little time and then vanisheth away."

"'Tis a waste where storm and gloom
Are gathering up from Memory's cell;
Where gapes the wide insatiate tomb
And fierce disease darkly dwell."

I thought upon the season of youth as compared to spring. I looked around and above me, and the green willow gently waving over the tomb-stone of some departed one; also some lofty elms which had stood the wreck of time for fifty years were clad in their richest mantle; bright flowers were on every side, exhaling their sweetness in the evening gale.

Thus, in the beginning of life, the happy hours of youth, so many pleasures seem scattered in our onward paths, so many visions of joyous felicity fill the youthful imagination, that we are prone to forget that we are mortal; that we may be cut down like the flower, and in one short hour wither and die. I passed farther. Here were sleeping side by side the tender infant, the mother, and the man of grey hairs. They were once active, once engaged in the noisy bustle of life; but their labors had ceased, they had gone to their long home, to a changeless state of existence. I looked forward beyond the tomb, in which their formless dust slumbered. I looked into the confines of eternity, and thought of the life that never dies—of an eternal state where death has no more power. And while the curtain which seperates us from the invisible world seemed drawn aside, I reflected upon the time when I should be borne to my lonely resting place, and not lonely "since Jesus hath lain there," when I should lie down beside the dead to await with them the resurrection morn, and I earnestly prayed I might then be found clad in the righteousness of Christ and be prepared to enjoy an inheritance among the sanctified. C.

THE HEATHEN FATHER.

My evening walks with Mr. and Mrs. Judson, were upon the hills, and near the principal of these pagodas. The ascent is fatiguing, though part of the way it is facilitated by brick stairs 12 or 15 feet wide.—The pagoda, as usual, is entirely solid.—Around its base are smaller ones, and numerous shrines, built of brick, nicely stuccoed, like little temples, from the size of a large dog house, up to the size of a small dwelling. Within and around these are images of Gaudama, precisely like the pictures of him in America, generally well gilt. Little paper flags, &c., &c., are before them the offerings of the devout. Tall flag staffs are numerously planted on the crown of the hill, with various streamers, some of which are tasteful and elegant.

A large and substantial house stands beside the pagoda, literally filled with images of Gaudama, most of them of colossal size. These are made of brick with a thick coating of plaster, in perfect repair, many of them apparently placed there by these deceived idolaters, quite lately. The number continually increases. One of these images is in a recumbent posture, and must be forty feet long. Some of the images represent worshippers in a most reverent attitude, before certain figures.

While walking among these distressing evidences of folly and misery, we often saw scenes like the following: A poor man struggled up the back part of the mountain with a little child on his hip, less than three years old, plucking a few green twigs from the bushes as he passed. He went up to a great bell, suspended in the arena, and, taking a deer's horn lying on the ground for the purpose, struck it twice or thrice. Then reverently entering the image house, he prostrated himself, and taught his little one to do the same, which it did so readily as to make it certain it was not its first attempt. He then prayed with the palms of his hands placed together, and raised to his forehead, while the poor little babe lisped out some of the same words. At the conclusion, he walked up to the idol he had addressed, and laid before it, with great solemnity, his offering of green leaves, and taking up the babe, descended the mountain.

O ye parents, who take no pains to teach your little ones to adore, and trust and serve the eternal God, be reproved and abashed! That poor idolator may confront and condemn you at the last awful day.

Thank God, the gospel is slowly extending its happy conquests in this place. Two very respectable people applied for baptism last Lord's-day, and many are persuaded that Boodh is no God.—A hundred Christians hold forth the truth, and a teeming press presents to the people the divine testimony. But we must pray for the Spirit's influence. May this not be our chief deficiency?—Malcom's Travels.

From the Rev. Mr. Kip's Sermon.

EARNESTNESS.

The truth should be proclaimed with earnestness. By this, I mean not, with excitement, or violent appeals to the passions, or with the parade of human machinery to work upon the feelings, for of all this there is too much in an age like the present, when men cannot trust the "still, small voice" to effect its work, but must themselves invoke "the whirlwind and the storm." We may be calm, even when actuated by the deepest earnestness, or the most glowing devotion. The seraph who bows before the throne, is calm, though his spirit burns with the very intensity of fervor. Our Lord was calm, through all his earthly pilgrimage, even when he was uttering the most withering rebukes against sin, and a zeal for his Father's glory was consuming him. No hasty or impetuous efforts marked his ministry. When men rejected his admonitions, we see no restlessness disturbing the serenity of his spirit,—no impatient resort to excitement, to surprise his hearers into attention. Sowing the seeds of imperishable truth, he expected not an immediate harvest, but labored on, knowing that one day they must bear fruit. Looking forward to the future, and building for the future, he was willing in quietness to commit his instructions to the world, conscious that they would not "return unto him void." He was calm, from a steady confidence in the ultimate triumph of his cause. He was "patient, because eternal." To have acted otherwise, would have proved him to be a partaker in the narrowness of human views, and in the frailty of human infirmities. Thus it is, that "the kingdom of God cometh not with observation." The deep and majestic river—the pathway of nations—rolls on its course in stillness, bearing on its broad bosom an empire's wealth; it is the short-lived, shallow stream, which froths and bubbles, and scatters its spray far over its banks, as it dashes on its noisy way.

The Glories of the Savior.—The following sublime sentence is from the London Missionary Register:

"In this contemplation we are at once lost in an unmeasurable ocean of overpowering glory. Imagination is bewildered—[illegible] fails. Go, take a survey of the world in which we dwell,—collect every [illegible] every quality which is praiseworthy, every [illegible] is lovely, combine these into one resplendent orb of beauty. Then leave the bounds of earth, wing your flight through the field of immensity; in your progress collect what is fair and lovely in every world,—what is bright and dazzling in every sun—combine these into other orbs of surpassing brightness; and thus continue to swell the number of magnificent aggregates, till the whole extent of creation is exhausted. And after having united these myriads of bright constellations, combining in itself the concentrated beauty and loveliness of the whole created universe, go and compare an atom to the world—a drop to the ocean—the twinkling of a taper to the full blaze of the noontide sun; and then may you compare even this all-comprehending constellation of beauty and loveliness with the boundless the ineffable beauty and excellence of Him who is the brightness of his Father's glory who is God over all, blessed for ever.

Vanity of earthly Splendor.—Abderame, Caliph of the Moors in Spain, reigned in the greatest magnificence and honor. After his death, the following was found in his writing:

"Fifty years have elapsed since I became Caliph. Riches, honors, and pleasure I have enjoyed in abundance, and have exhausted them all. The kings, my rivals, esteemed, dreaded, and envied me. All those things coveted by mankind, were bestowed by heaven upon me with a prodigal hand. In this long space of apparent felicity, I have calculated the number of days in which I have found myself happy; the number amounts to fourteen. Mortals, hence appreciate the value of splendor, of worldly enjoyments, and even life itself.'

Two things well considered, would prevent many quarrels; first to have it well ascertained whether we are not disputing about terms, rather than things; and, secondly, to examine whether that on which we differ is worth contending about.

There is one noble trait observable in human nature all over the world. The man who has been unjustly injured excites the sympathy of his fellows, and nothing advances a cause so much as the persecution of its supporters. The world cannot become wholly depraved while such is the disposition of mankind.

WHAT ARE WE DOING FOR THE SALVATION OF SINNERS?

My inquiry in the last Register was, "What are we doing for the salvation of the aged?" But I see all classes around me going forward to the Judgment unprepared; aged, middle-aged, and youth—all crowding the broad way that leads to death. Are we who profess to be on our way to Heaven, doing our utmost to save the multitude? Do we try to arouse the careless? Do we seek out inquirers? Do we know what to say to an inquiring sinner when we meet with him? If we felt more deeply in view of the condition of sinners, our efforts to save them would be more energetic. Our feelings ought to be in unison with David's, as expressed in Psalm cxix. verses 53, 136, and 158:—

"Horror hath taken hold upon me, because of the wicked that forsake thy law."

"Rivers of waters run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy law."

"I beheld the transgressors, and was grieved; because they kept not thy word."

Such emotions will not be transient in their influences, but will prompt us to "patient continuance in well-doing," that we may win souls to Christ. J. R. J.

INDUSTRY.

The fourth command of the decalogue lays upon us two distinct obligations: it imposes labor no less expressly than it enjoins a holy rest. "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work." It is a fair inference that a life of idleness is a disobedience to the law. The idle person who appears occasionally devout, separates what God hath joined together. For He that said "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy" has also said, "Six days shalt thou labor." Well directed industry is a moral and christian duty which none that are capable of it, can dispense with and be guiltless. Neither wealth nor rank can excuse a person in good health and competent faculties, from some kind of useful labor.

But in these latter times, manual labor is accounted by many too low an employment. Many a young gentleman and many a young lady, would regard it a dishonor to do any thing called work, though in circumstances imperatively demanding it. In this respect the manners and taste of society have suffered a deplorable change. Mary, Queen of England, was accustomed to spend a portion of her time in needle-work. It was his habits of industry that enabled Washington without confusion to conduct the complicated business of military command, and civil administration.

Few things are impossible to industry well-directed. By it men of ordinary talent rise to deserved eminence. What difficulties have been overcome, what wonders have been wrought, and what benefits have been derived from the industrious application of the faculties of man? H. P.

RUINOUS EFFECTS OF SIN.

Sin is rebellion against God; and as such, it ever has, ever will, and ever must meet with the divine displeasure. It is the perversion of all order, and tends to subvert every principle of justice, of goodness, and of truth. It aims at the destruction of all happiness, and ultimates in the misery and ruin of all its votaries. The consequences following in its train, time and eternity can alone disclose. Its ruinous effects upon the moral world are inexpressibly great. Who can tell the difference between the present condition of the world, and what it would have been, if sin had remained a stranger to earth? But this foe of God and man has entered our world, and with it the ruin of all that is lovely, or to be desired by holy, happy beings. The flood-gates of immorality are thrown wide open, and the destructive, baneful flood rolls o'er the earth, bearing away upon its dark bosom the innocence and happiness of all men.

Before sin laid its polluting hand upon the soul and defaced the moral image of God in man, he was innocent and happy; but now he is guilty and unhappy.

How replete is the history of mankind with moral pollution and mental anguish!—If we look into the present condition of the human family, what do we behold? Men who in the order of created intelligences were made a little lower than the angels, crowned with glory, and sent forth to multiply and replenish the earth with holy, harmless, happy beings—men made to respect the rights of their fellows, and to harmonize in all the affairs of life, and to lift up their voices together in songs of praise and thanksgiving to God, their Creator, divided into classes or nations, casting off the restraints of the divine law, and hating and provoking each other to deeds of blood. How changed!

When God gave existence to this earth, "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." Ah! little did they then know that this beautiful world would become the theatre of shameful deeds, and hard-hearted and heaven-provoking villanies. Men, as if they had lost all sight of right and wrong to promote their own selfish interests, and to satisfy unholy desires, trample upon the dearest rights and feelings of their fellows, and then close their eyes and ears to the tears, groans, and complaints of those they have unrighteously thrown into circumstances of deep distress. Thus we see that men are not only at variance with God, but they are at variance with each other; and the law which requires us to love God with all our hearts and our neighbor as ourselves, is set at nought, rejected, and trampled upon.

Every faculty and passion of the soul has fallen under the dominion of sin. By it the judgment is perverted, by it the will is controlled, and by it the affections are corrupted, and all are in a deranged and ruined state.

Sin has not only polluted the soul, and thrown a dark cloud over the moral destinies of man, but it has ruined our physical existence. The awful scourge has visited the bodies as well as the souls of men.—We come into existence with the seeds of disease sown in our physical constitution, which soon spring up and ripen into death. These are "the wages of sin." God, in pronouncing the curse upon man, said, "of the dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." These bodies, then, which are so fearfully and wonderfully made, will soon be disorganized and reduced to their primeval state. Thus, while the souls of men are suffering under the lashes of conscience and weighed down under a load of guilt, the body is writhing under pains occasioned by accident, want, or disease. The whole man suffers—the whole man is ruined.—But he has ruined himself. "O! Israel," says God, "thou hast ruined thyself."—Wo unto us because we have sinned.

But the ruinous effects of sin are not confined to man alone. For his sake the ground is cursed. Thorns and thistles now spring up in the place of pleasant fruits, and flowers, and wholesome food. Its fatal consequences extend still farther. It reaches every element, takes hold upon the ethereal heavens, and lays all in ruin. The time is coming, says the Apostle, "when the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements melt with fervent heat.—The earth also, and the works therein shall be burned up. The world that now is, is reserved unto the day of judgment, for the perdition of ungodly men." But the fatal consequences of sin do not stop here.—They reach into eternity, and bury the soul in endless ruin. Oh, the ruin of the soul! The soul that must endure forever, and forever writhe under the painful consequences of sin! The soul, once innocent and happy, before which lay an unbounded ocean of pleasure! The soul that might have existed eternally in unison with God, around which a halo of glory would eternally have been thrown—exiled from God, from heaven, and from all its native enjoyments, and cast down, polluted, dishonored, and despoiled of all its original excellency, into the bottomless pit! And is there no help for the soul? In eternity there is no help. Despair now "spreads its raven wings' over all its future prospects, and every attempt to escape would be to sink deeper in the pit of wo. But is there no help?—In this life only there is help. For sinners, favored with a day of grace, help is laid on one mighty to save. By him we may be redeemed out of all our iniquities, and cleansed from all sin. By Him the soul may be reinstated in the favor of God, and blessed with its native purity and enjoyments. But to bring about this glorious deliverance for the soul, and also to raise the body from corruption, and to restore the whole man to his original, perfect, and glorified state, the life of the Son of God must be sacrificed. This glorious act of divine mercy has been consummated. The soul of Jesus Christ was made an offering for sin. How great, then, must be the ruin of the soul that requires such a price to redeem it! and how important it is, in view of the eternal destinies of the soul, that a speedy application be made to the only source of remedy. Oh, sinner, think on thy moral condition! Thou art ruined, and will be ruined forever, unless the saving and cleansing efficacy of the blood of Jesus Christ be applied to thy soul. Now is the time to avail thyself of the glorious salvation. Soon it will be too late.

Again. Who can revolve in his mind the consequences of sin upon this life, and this world, without deeply deploring its existence? Sin is the abominable thing which God hates; and it should be hated by all intelligent beings. We ought to flee its very appearance—to break off our sins by righteousness, and turn unto the Lord who will have mercy, and unto our God who will abundantly pardon.

We learn that the Convention at 2nd Brookfield church, is to take place on the first day following the 2nd Sabbath in April, and not the first as stated in a former number.

REVIVAL RECORD.

The First Seventh-day Baptist Church in Verona, has been favored with a gracious outpouring of the spirit during the past winter. Meetings were held for prayer and religious conference in different parts of the town over which the members of this church are scattered, and conducted by Br. Charles Lewis, who has been laboring for some few months to build up the interests of the Redeemer in this place. These efforts together with the preached word, have been blessed and crowned with the hopeful conversion of about thirty souls. The gracious work is yet going forward.

A glorious revival has recently been experienced in Nunda, Allegany co. N. Y. Accounts say from FOUR to FIVE HUNDRED have been hopefully converted.

GREAT REVIVAL IN PITTSBURGH.

A correspondent of the Pittsburgh Daily Gazette, says "Almost every denomination and nearly every congregation in Pittsburgh, Allegheny, and Birmingham, are enjoying a season of refreshing. In one of the Methodist congregations, there has been a most remarkable excitement for more than two years, which possess now all the freshness of a new thing, not at all abated." Speaking of the revival in the city, he says "people are seen in the morning at six o'clock flocking to the lecture rooms, "like doves to the windows" and in the evening to the main body of the church, to hear the gospel of the grace of God. The anxious seat each successive eveni : is crowded, while all through the house the falling tear and sedate countenance say, "truly this is none other than the house of God and the very gate of Heaven." In speaking of the members added to the different churches, he says, "I am not prepared to give a definite report. But it is not uncommon for scores to unite with one congregation a week."

Elder Hill, pastor of the Baptist Church in Troy, N. York, speaking of the revival in that place, says:—

"This is the sixth revival that has occured in this Church within the last ten years; none of which were the result of previous arrangements for protracted meetings; we have followed the manifest guidance of the Holy Spirit as He has produced conviction of sin, and induced the cry from many, "What shall I do to be saved." In the present instance, with the exception of a few sermons from brother Hutchins, of Bennington, I have had no assistance in preaching, and I assure you I never better enjoyed the delightful work of "holding forth" the crucified and risen Savior to anxious sinners.

Elder Hill being about to leave his church, to enter the service of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, says, "it excites a lively gratitude in my heart to God, that I can leave them in the midst of such great prosperity."

REVIVAL IN WESTMINSTER, MASS.

The following is from the Christian Watchman.

Last fall the church felt that something must be done to stem the current of impiety. Days of fasting and prayer were observed. Near the first of January a meeting was commenced to be continued through the week. At the close of the week but few if any favorable indications could be seen —the attendance was small and almost confined to the church. It was resolved to continue the meeting another week; the attendance increased, and an aged gentleman expressed hope in Christ. The meeting was continued, many of the church came in, and a most pleasing revival commenced and still progresses.

The youth of ten or twelve years of age, and the father of more than three score and ten, are numbered among the joyful converts. Nearly fifty have expressed hope, and many are still saying, "What shall we do to be saved?". In some large families, only one remains unconverted. Husbands and wives rejoice together in several instances.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

IMPORTANT FROM CHINA.

By the ship Navigator, Capt. Bridges, from Canton, information is received that hostilities have been commenced on the part of the Chinese. The Canton press of Nov. 16th, says, that on the night of Tuesday and the morning of Wednesday, the Chinese opened their batteries on the British shipping at Hong Kong. The firing commenced at half-past twelve, and was kept up till three in the morning when it ceased, but was recommenced at four and continued till day-light. No damage however was done, not a single shot having hit any of the vessels. Had their fires been well directed they might have done immense damage, it being perfectly calm at the time. At day-light they had retreated and removed their guns, leaving nothing but their breastworks remaining. The shipping made no attempt to retaliate, though the Hyacinth was at Hong Kong to destroy the forts and batteries. All that day and the next, the weather continuing calm, the shipping continued at anchor; but on Thursday and Friday they removed to Tungkoo Bay, where they remained. This measure of removal had been previously determined on, but it was supposed that the Chinese would consider it a flight. The High Commissioner was determined to put a stop to the trans-shipping of British property under the flags of other nations, as had been hitherto done. The report that trade had been stopped with all nations brought by the Morea, was contradicted, but it was generally thought that a stoppage of the foreign trade would take place soon.

Correspondence of the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

Paris, Feb. 27, 1840.

RESIGNATION OF THE FRENCH MINISTERS—REJECTION OF THE DONATION BILL.

The donation bill of the King's son, on his approaching marriage, has been ignominiously thrown out of the Chamber, the Court is covered with disgrace, and the ministers are discharged. I use an uncourtly phrase, inasmuch as to resign by compulsion is still resignation; but it was generally reported in the lobby of the chamber, that these gentleman in case of defeat, must resign, or they would be discharged. Such a fate has been richly merited by ministers who, when in opposition, successfully took the lead against the very measure, in another shape, which they have now unblushingly attempted to carry; and it is a remarkable fact, that the party which now contributed to its rejection were the men who, as ministers on the former occasion, sought to carry it. The majority against the crown was 26, in a house of 426 members. Of that majority the party of Count Molé, the former President of the Council, furnished 21 hostile votes, and the friends of Thiers, mustered 17. As ministers always possess a phalanx of 106, who seem to have a special retainer to vote that black is white when required so to do, this defeat must be considered a fair illustration of popular feeling.

The event is unquestionably one of the most memorable that have occured in the parliamentary history of France since the revolution of 1830, and it is generally understood by the warmest friends of the king, that a few such experiments would sap the foundation of the monarchy.

Twenty members having demanded the ballot, which was granted, a death-like silence prevailed during the process, and when the doleful result was announced from the chair, the consternation of ministers was too evident to escape remark. They made up their packages, and mournfully took their departure.

It is quite unnecessary to describe the consternation of the royal family. A courier was immediately despatched to the Duke of Saxe Coburg, the father of the intended bride, now at Brussels, to make him acquainted with the royal discomfiture. The garrison of Paris was ordered to be on the alert, and prepared for the suppression of any tumult that might arise.

It is said that the Duke d' Aumale, the youngest of the king's sons, when he heard of the disaster, burst into a flood of tears; and throwing his arms around the neck of his royal mother, intreated to be allowed to divide his fortune with the Duke de Nemours.—He inherited an immense property from the Duke of Condé.

Louis Philippe, by way of retaliation, has countermanded the festivities of the court. If the people will not endow his children, they clearly do not deserve to drink his punch or dance to the sound of his minstrels. No conclusion can be more logical than this.

To report the various efforts to form a new ministry up to the present hour would be an endless task. Guizot is quite out of the question, and he has taken his departure to London on his embassy. The Duke de Broglie was directed to take the work in hand but failed. M. Thiers is now commissioned to construct the cabinet, and Marshal Soult has declared that between him and Thiers there can be no possibility of union.

The Eastern question is still in obeyance, and France evidently keeps aloof from the other powers. This is quite manifest from a declaration of Lord Palmerston in his place in the British Parliament, in answer to a question from Sir R. Peel, as to the construction of a passage in the Queen's address, to the effect that the unanimity of the five powers had prevented the breaking out of hostilities, and expressing a hope that the same unanimity would bring about a final settlement, so as to preserve the integrity of the Ottoman empire. The hope, said the foreign minister, was founded on a declaration of Louis Philippe in his address to the Chambers, in which the maintenance of the integrity of the Ottoman empire was stated to be the policy of his government.—The hope was also founded upon the knowledge which he had of the sentiments of the other three powers; and his lordship added that negotiations were still in progress on the subject. As the policy of the four powers has, from the commencement, remained unchanged, while France has avowedly wheeled about, the only possible negotiation that can exist must arise out of that untoward circumstance.

It is a fact of some importance in respect to this question, that the British government, in moving the navy estimates, has recommended an additional maritime force, on the sole ground that the navy of France has been considerably increased. They who doubt the solidity of the Anglo-French alliance remark, that so long as France was considered the real friend of England, the development of its maritime power excited no comment, and they infer an approaching separation: but the positive declarations of Lord Palmerston, in answer to the taunts of his Tory tormentors in the House of Commons, lead to an inference directly opposite. If, said he, there was a growing jealousy on the part of France toward England, he was not surprised, seeing how every thing relating to that country was objected to, exaggerated, or misrepresented, by the Tories in Parliament, or by the press which is supported by that party. He professed his ability to furnish satisfactory proof that the French government was perfectly convinced that union and peace were as desirable between the two countries as hitherto, and as much for the interest of France as for those of England; and added, that France had afforded another instance of amicable feelings in granting to England the right of search when French ships were suspected of participating in the slave trade.

On the other hand it is declared, that a treaty has been signed between England and Russia, for mutual co-operation, in case of Mehemet's advance toward Constantinople, and an attempt is made to show that the Anglo-French compact is ipso facto violated; but this inference is far from being legitimate.

The occupation of Port Mahon by France, with the consent of the Spanish Government, for a military hospital, has aroused the bile of the English Tories, who have displayed a temper on this subject which is not creditable to any party. This island, is situated midway between Algiers and France, was occupied by the United States also for a hospital, on payment of an annual rent. Your Government assigned the lease of the buildings to France, and that lease, having expired, has been since renewed by Spain, with the perfect knowledge and implied consent of Great Britain.

Dispatches of the 15th have been received from Marshal Valée, which state that nothing new had occurred in the province of Algiers. He is silent, as might be expected, as to ulterior proceedings in meditation against his Arab foes, but a private letter announces the approaching departure of a little expedition to Cherchell, in order to avenge the capture of a French vessel by the inhabitants of that port. The chief of them have already sent a deputation to the Governor, disclaiming all participation in that piratical act, and offering to pay the value of the vessel; but the marshal has declined to accede to this proposal.

While this force is being employed against the pirate port, the Arabs encamped in the neighborhood of Blidah will be compelled to measure their strength with a French force which is to be sent against them.

"Such is [illegible] opposition of the priesthood to the present government, that no successor to the archbishop of Paris had yet been found. If the ministers were wise this fact might be admirably turned to account. The experience of the last two months shows that Paris can do exceedingly well without an archbishop—and as the government a [illegible] has hitherto proved to be quite as expensive as any former one, there is a delightful opportunity of commencing the work of economy without touching on the personal comforts of the monarch, or impairing the dignity of his office. A few such lessons would be useful to his Holiness the Pope, who is at the bottom of these disgraceful manœuvres.

EGYPT.

Mehemet Ali continues his warlike preparations, but the attempt to organize a National Guard has met with universal opposition. Entire villages have fled in a mass and have taken refuge in the desert with the risk of being starved to death. The Viceroy hoped to be able to raise 100,000 National Guards in Egypt and the same number in Syria.

The Shah of Persia has sent his physician on an embassy to Mehemet; offering an alliance offensive and defensive against England. There is a report also of proposals from Mehemet to Great Britain in which some securities are offered for India, but the account is derived from the Augsburgs Gazette, upon which in general not a particle of reliance can be placed.

TURKEY.

The reform of the political institutions of this hitherto tottering empire is continued with unabated zeal. A law has just been promulgated for the formation of municipal councils in different towns. Many persons have doubted the sincerity of the promised reforms, and the possibility of carrying them out, but we have sufficient evidence of the perseverance of the Divan in this salutary work to satisfy the most skeptical mind. It has been demonstrated that in a district which paid 4 millions in taxes, only 350,000 reached the treasury of the Sultan; consequently 3,650,000 were absorbed by rapacious Pachas or their underlings.

Kosrew Pacha, the grand vizier, has had an apoplectic fit, and is considered incapable of resuming the helm of affairs. The young Sultan is afflicted with the same pulmonary complaint that carried off his father; but four of his wives are expected in the month of May to provide successors to the throne, in case his highness should not recover. I suspect the account of his illness to be exaggerated.

The patriarch of Constantinople is found to be deeply implicated in the Greek conspiracy to dethrone King Otho in favor of a Russian prince. The British embassador has demanded his removal from office, but has been opposed by Russia, and the matter is yet undecided.

Austria has signified to the Porte that in case Mehemet should menace Turkey a military corps shall be sent for its protection.

RUSSIA.

Accounts have arrived of the farther progress of the expedition to Khiva. On the 12th January, the detachment of General Perowski, after having halted near the river Yemba, had advanced in four columns toward Ak-Bulah. In the former of these places a Russian garrison was left, together with the sick and wounded. The troops support the fatigues of the march, and the number of sick diminishes. I have nothing new with regard to the Russians in Asterabad, in Persia, where their forces are conveniently stationed to watch the movements of England in the neighborhood of Herat; but letters of the 8th instant, from St. Petersburg, show the ramifications of Russian intrigue in another quarter—the capital of the Chinese Empire.

An embassy from St. Petersburg is about to set out for Pekin, and the most important part of the communication is, that the embassy consists of military officers of distinction, whose mission may be presumed to be that of assisting the Chinese by their counsel in the approaching conflict with Great Britain. In a preceding letter I noticed the departure of missionaries to the same capital, and the approaching return of some who had resided there for ten years.

SPAIN.

The Queen opened the Cortes in person on the 18th inst. You will have obtained the address of her Majesty from another quarter. She formally delcares her intention to present bills to the Cortes for altering the present democratic constitution of the municipalities and the provincial deputations; also against the electoral law and the liberty of the press. She manfully resolves to give increased security and dignity to the priesthood, without forgetting the doleful condition of the nuns and secular monks. In her Majesty's resolves to improve the glory of popery, she seems to have forgotten but one thing, which is the re-establishment of the Inquisition. That is doubtless to come hereafter.

A letter from the head quarters of Espartero announces that the besieging force was to advance immediately upon Segura. A flag of truce had been sent from the fortress, offering to submit upon terms which the Christino commander, Zurbano, would not accede to. On the 19th, Espartero was at Muniesa.

Don Francisco Perregue, the second in command in Catalonia, has succeeded, by a bold coup de main in surprising the corps of mountain Celadores, which escorted the receiver of Carlist contributions. That rebel functionary remains in the custody of the Christinos. In different skirmishes, the rebels have lost in Catalonia, 21 killed, 26 prisoners, and 32 deserters.

Cabrera, who was long since killed by the Spanish journals and brought to life again by the Carlists, has never yet been seen, so that we have reason to suspect the accounts of his existence to be false. This fact derives increased probability from the escape of five Christino prisoners in consequence of the revolt of two Carlist battalions, who insisted upon having their generalissimo produced to them. The rebel authorities declared this to be impossible, and as the informers took flight before the conclusion of that affair, we are yet in the dark as to the result. Polo and Langostera the Carlists chiefs next in command, keep themselves within the garrison of Morella instead of taking their usual stations at the outposts.

TRADE WITH CHINA.—The London, East India and China Association have presented to Lord Palmerston the following outline of a treaty they wish him to make with the Chinese:

"That a commercial treaty be obtained permitting—1st, admission not only at Canton, but at other ports to the northward, near the silk and tea districts; 2d, trade with the natives generally, but if limited to the Hongs, the Chinese Government to guarantee their solvency; 3d, that British subjects in China shall not be treated by the Government as inferiors, but left free to possess warehouses, have their families with them, and be protected from insult by the Chinese laws; 4th, that a tariff of duties be fixed on by both Governments; 5th, that the Queen's representative as Superintendent of trade, be allowed direct communication with the Emperor, his Minister, and the local authorities, and also to reside at Pekin, on a given port; 6th; that in case of an infraction of Chinese law, each British subject shall only be responsible for his own acts, and that the innocent shall not be confounded with the guilty; 7th, that in case of a refusal by the Chinese to open their ports generally, the grant of an island be obtained (by purchase or otherwise) for the establishment of a British factory."—Evening Post.

SUMMARY.

The latest intelligence from Mexico, gives us but little information, relative to the movements of the Mexican troops.

A new steamboat (Napoleon) has been put on the Hudson, to carry passengers between New York and Albany.

An aged man, and formerly a custom house officer at Rio Janerio, after several fruitless attempts to kill his son and a woman in the house, the doors of whic he had previously fastened, afterwards succeeded in killing his daughter, and then himself. The tragedy was attributed to mental alienation.

The Clerk of the House of Representatives declines franking any more packages for members of Congress, on account of alleged frauds.

Mr. Naylor, of the third Congressional district, Pa., has been indirectly challenged to a duel by Chas. Ingersoll, son of Chas. J. Ingersoll, who contested Mr. Naylor's seat in Congress. Both gentlemen have been arrested.

The New Era recommends a spirited remonstrance to the passage of the Registry Law, and says, "If calm remonstrance is not effectual, we have the example of our revolutionary sires before us."

Lake Navigation open.—The Steamer Transit, Capt. Richardson, is already plying between Toronto and Niagara. The St. Lawrence is advertised to commence her trips on the south side of the Lake on the first of April.

Flour was selling at the last advices in Pittsburg at $2,63 to $2,75 per barrel.

The revolutions of the paddle wheels of the British Queen, on her late voyage from Portsmouth to New York, are ascertained by means of a clock attached to the machinery to have been two hundred and ninety-one thousand eight hundred and forty eight. The diameter of the paddle wheels is thirty-one feet.

The Mexican Congress has ratified the indemnity for claims of citizens of the United States against that Republic. Gen. Santa Anna has obtained his passports with a view of traveling, whether in the United States or elsewhere is not known.

The Congress of Mexico has also authorized the government to borrow $100,000. This loan is expected to be one of the ways and means for carrying on the war against Texas. Slavery is thought to be the occasion of the proposed campaign.—"Mexico gives freedom to men of all colors, and she has her destiny to fulfil in this respect."

DR. JOSEPH PARRISH died a few days since in Philadelphia. The newspapers speak in terms of high commendation of his virtues.

An English Yacht arrived at Charleston, S. C. a few days since. She is the property of certain English gentlemen—is last from the island of Cuba, bound to New-York. The N. Y. Spectator says, "Among the marvels of the day is a cruise across the Atlantic in a pleasure boat."

Unparalleled Speed in Traveling.—The Wilmington Advertiser says several travelers who passed over the Wilmington and Weldon Rail Road, a few days ago, reached New York in seven days from Cuba. They had four days passage from Havana to Charleston, and three from Charleston to New York on the Rail Road."

By a letter from Capt. Hoskens of the Steam ship Great Western, it appears that the late passage of the G. W. across the Atlantic, was made eight hours sooner than that by the British Queen.

Green Peas were plenty in New Orleans on the first of this month.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.—The dispute between the United States and Great Britain, in reference to the Northeastern Boundary, is attracting attention in England. "If the course we pursue," says the London Shipping Gazette, "in the dispute with China be found to be injurious to American commerce, there are elements already at work of a character sufficiently inflammable to render them not over fastidious or punctilious at finding out some real or imaginary line of distinction to be drawn between our proceedings and the French blockades in South America. We question, therefore, if we are over and above secure against being involved in a quarrel with the United States, if we proceed to the blockade of the ports of the Celestial Empire without declaring war. At all events, it will be wise in ministers to act with circumspection, and weigh well the probable consequences, before they are so far committed that they cannot retreat without a sacrifice of principle."

Outrageous.—We are informed by a gentleman from Fort Townson, that two or three weeks since, a citizen of the United States, at the head of eight or ten men, had occasion to go into Texas, for some purpose, where he came across a party of Cherokee Indians on the borders of Texas, who kept in sight of him for two or three days, without manifesting any hostility. One night, after the Cherokees had encamped, the whites stole upon them and killed seven or eight of their number, when the Indians returned the fire, killed one or two of the whites, and then fled. The cause assigned by the commander of the whites for attacking the Indians was, that he was afraid they intended to attack him and therefore took the start of them. If this is the true state of the case, we think the United States should punish the aggressors, and prevent, if possible, any further outrages of the kind.—Our informant states that the officers and agents at Fort Townson consider it an outrageous and unprovoked murder. Will they not then have the matter investigated, and justice rendered to the Indians?—Little Rock Times, Feb. 24.

Steam Engine sent Post.—A few days since a perfect working model of a steam engine was transmitted through the Post office, from Sheffield to London. The total weight being under four ounces, it was charged as eight letters—namly 8d, which being pre paid at Sheffield, it came safe to hand with its fellow penny travelers.—Wolverhampton Chronicle.

Charge from Brazil.—The Chevalier Pedro Rodrigues Fernandes Chaves, Charge d' Affaires of the Emperor of Brazil, has presented his credential letters to the Secretary of State, and been introduced in his official character to the President.

Manhattan Bank.—It affords us great pleasure to announce the election of William M. Vermilye, Esq., as cashier of the Manhattan Bank. Mr. Vermilye has been for many years the cashier of the Merchant's Exchange Bank, and is a gentleman universally esteemed. We may add that his integrity and financial ability afford good assurance that under his management the affairs of the Manhattan Bank will be retrieved.

From the New York Express.

In the Boston Municipal Court, on Monday, RANSOM CLARK was convicted on a charge of passing counterfeit money. He is the only survivor of Major DADE's company in Florida. He was left for dead on the field, and was horribly mangled, but finally escaped. He formerly delivered lectures on the Florida war. His guilt in the present case was so apparent, the jury did not leave their seats; but he was recommended to the mercy of the court.

PLYMOUTH, Eng., Feb. 17, 1840.—An American diver, named Scott, has been astonishing some of the people in this neighborhood by his extraordinary feats, having leapt into the the water twice (on different occasions) from a very elevated position on board the San Josef bearing the flag of the Admiral Superintendent of the dock yard. On the first occasion he descended from the top-sail yard arm, a height of about 120 feet: and on the second from the top gallant yard, a height of about 190 feet. Even at this inclement season, it is surprising to see the number of persons assembled to witness the extraordinary performance.—London U. Service Journal.

DEWITT C. PEABODY in the employ of Stone & Clark, of Ithaca, as engraver, was arrested, on Sunday last, by the sheriff of Orleans county, on a charge of being concerned in counterfeiting—A large supply of red back bills on the Bank of Warsaw were found secreted in his room.—He was examined on Monday and committed.—Elmira Republican.

DISTRESSING OCCURRENCE.—On Friday night of last week, the dwelling house of Mr. Abraham Tripp of this town was consumed by fire, and two children burned to death. Mr. Tripp was from home. His wife was awoke in the night by the noise of the fire. She proceeded to a small room in another part of the house, and on opening the door the flame burst out upon her. She seized a pail and went to the well for water, and while absent her daughter, aged about 13 years, had left her bed, with a grandchild only a few months old, and got into the part in which the fire was raging. Their mothers heard their screams, but could not rescue them. They were consumed with the dwelling.—Schoharie Patriot.

Earthquakes.—The latest arrivals from the Mediterranean state that Vesuvius is inwardly convulsed, and thick clouds of smoke cover the mountain top, the vapor of which is so very prejudicial to the vines in the immediate neighborhood, that the Government has remitted the taxes of the growers. It is a remarkable fact that the eruptions of Vesuvius have, almost in every case, been preceded by alarming indications of the volcanic action in Perthshire. About a month ago, it will be recollected, that some smart shocks were felt at Crieff and Comrie. It now turns out that, almost immediately afterwards, Vesuvius became convulsed. It thus appears that there must be a chain of strata, of uniform sympathy, stretching from the Grampian and Ochill Hills to Italy. There is nothing in the history of Scotland to show that earthquakes were peculiar to Perthshire, previous to the great earthquake at Lisbon; but, since that time, they have been more or less common; and on the assumption that a chain of electrical strata does exist in this direction, the conclusion might be drawn that, 'the foundations of the earth,' so to speak, were then 'rent;' and thus, according to Daubeney's hypothesis, 'water and atmospheric air' would thereafter find comparatively easy access through the channels in the rocks, and reaching the heat which is believed to 'exist below a given point of the earth's surface,' produce the volcanic action. From the borings which have been made in Perthshire, in search of coal, the strata have been proved to be highly charged with electricity, more especially in the valley of Strathearn; and it has also been demonstrated that the heat there is not far from the earth's surface. Loch Earne, too, never freezes—a phenomenon exclusively applicable to that lake, as compared with others of equal dimensions in Scotland. Taking all these circumstances into account, we think they open up a very interesting and inviting field for the further investigation of physical science in connection with volcanic phenomena, and we hope the attention of scientific gentlemen will be early directed to the subject.—Aberdeen Journal.

HYDROPHOBIA—A Remarkable Case.—A Letter from Reading, (Pa.,) states that a singular case of hydrophobia lately occurred in that town. Two or three weeks ago, a dog belonging to Mr. John Rogers bad been fighting with another dog, and soon after exhibited some symptoms of canine madness. On last Wednesday, this animal attacked two or three cats, and tore them to pieces. On Friday, Mr. Rogers was recommended to keep his dog tied up, as the signs of madness had become obvious to the neighbors. It appears that Mr. R. did not attend immediately to this suggestion, so that the dog, being unsecured, bit a cat, which was a pet of one of Mr. R.'s children. This cat came into the child's bedroom in the morning, as usual, jumped on the bed, and, while playing with the little boy, bit him on the nose. About two hours after, the boy was taken ill, with symptoms of hydrophobia. The dog was then pursued, overtaken, and shot on Saturday afternoon. On Monday the child was much worse, and few hopes are entertained of his recovery. The report of the physician confirmed the fears of the family as to the nature of the disease. A cat belonging to Mrs. Baker, was also bitten by the same dog, and being pursued by the neighbors, run into Mrs. B.'s house, jumped at a little girl, and bit the calf of her leg severely. By the application of caustic immediately to the wound, the girl is supposed to be placed out of danger.—Philadelphia Ledger.

SHOCKING AND FATAL ACCOUNT.—Yesterday afternoon, a little after five o'clock, says the Pennsylvania Inquirer, a false alarm of fire was given in the southern part of the city, and a few young men who were members of the Franklin fire company, drew out their engine from its station, in Catherine st., above third, near the free school.

Unfortunately, the boys were at the very moment rushing out of the school house, and acting from a natural impulse, quite a crowd of them from six to fourteen yeays of age, seized the rope and began to run with the engine. The young men attached to the apparatus, endeavored to free the rope of as many of the boys as they could, but to clear it of all was impossible. The engine had scarcely proceeded round the corner into Third street, above Catharine, before two of the boys fell—and two of the young men at the tongue of the engine, by dint of main strength, turned the machine a little out of a straight line to save them from harm, and as far as these boys are concerned, they succeeded. But at that moment, several of the other boys fell, and the wheels passed over the head of a fine lad about ten years of age named Mulholland, who died instantly.

The deceased was the son of Mr. Mulholland, who resides in German street. A second boy, about the same age, the son of Mr. Foreman, who keeps a tavern at the corner of Fourth and German streets, had both his thighs crushed and broken by the wheels, and it is believed impossible for him to live through the night. Indeed, we have heard a report that he is since dead. A third boy had his arm broken near the wrist—and one or two others are more or less injured. No blame was attached to the members of the Franklin Company, who was driving the engine.

MYSTERIOUS.—Yesterday morning, the body of a man drifted ashore near the public State Quarantine ground. He appeared to be about thirty years of age, had red hair and whiskers, and a tuft of hair under the chin. He had nothing upon him except a white shirt, and had been thrust with his head down into a salt bag. A piece of new bale rope was tied round his body and neck in two bowling knots, which must have been done by a seafaring person. He was lashed with his knees up to his breast, and the end of the rope was in a bowling knot, which appeared to have had a stone fastened in it. The body had the appearance of having been in the water only one or two days.

EXPOSTULATION.

BY WILLIAM H. BURLEIGH.

"Like thee, oh stream! to glide in solitude
Noiselessly on, reflecting sun and star,
Unseen by man, and from the great world's jar
Kept evermore aloof—methinks 'twere good
To live thus lonely through the silent lapse
Of my appointed time!" Not wisely said,
Unthanking Quietest! The brook hath sped
Its course for ages through the narrow grasp
Of rifted hills, and o'er the reedy plain,
Or 'mid the eternal forests, not in vain—
The grass more groweth on its brink,
And lovelier flowers and richer fruits are there
And of its crystal waters myriads drink,
That else would faint beneath the torrid air

CONTINUED.

Inaction now is crime. The old Earth reels,
Inebriate with guilt; and Vice, grown bold,
Laughs innocence to scorn. The thirst for gold,
Hath made them demons, till the heart that feels
The impulse of impartial love, nor kneels
In worship foul to mammon, is contemned
He who hath kept his purer faith, and stemmed
Corruption's tide, and from the ruffian heels
Of impious tramplers rescued perilled Right,
Is called fanatic, and with scoffs and jeers
Maliciously assailed. The poor man's tears
Are unregarded—the oppressor's might
Revered as law,—and he whose righteous way
Departs from evil, makes himself a prey.

CONCLUDED.

What then! Shall Truth's anointed priest succumb
To popular Falsehood, and fling down his shield,
And drop the sword he has been taught to wield,
In Virtue's cause? Shall Righteousness be dumb,
Awe-struck before Injustice? No!—a cry,
"Ho! to the rescue!" from the hills hath rung,
And men have heard and to the combat sprung.
Strong for the right, to conquer or to die!
Up, loiterer! for on the wings are flung,
The banners of the faithful!—and erect
Beneath their folds the hosts of God's elect
Stand in their strength. Be thou their ranks among.
Fear not, nor falter, though the strife endure,
Thy cause is sacred, and the victory sure.

From the Oberlin Evangelist.

They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles.—Is. 40: 31.

Up, christian, up, take wings and fly
Above the tempest, and the storm;
Upon thy Father's strength rely—
Thy God, his promise, shall perform.

As the strong eagle in his might,
Soars on; by powerful pinions borne;
So may'st thou wing thy glorious flight,
And all the powers of darkness scorn.

What tho' the billows wildly roll,
What tho' the clouds may darkly lower!
Thy God shall bear thy trembling soul,
Far, far, above their raging power.

Then place thy firm unshaken trust,
In Him who doth the winds command;
On His unfailing promise rest,
And lean upon His strong right hand.

Go, leave the cares of earth beneath—
With soul renewed; and sins forgiven,
Mount upward on the wings of faith,
Rejoicing in the smiles of heaven.

EMPLOYMENT OF TIME.

Extract from Mr. Moore's Address before the General Trades' Union, &c. Sept. 1834.

What can be more humiliating to the Philosopher, or discouraging to the Philanthropist, than the reflection that a majority of mankind rather seek to kill time than improve it! It is generally those who need instruction most, that strive least to obtain it; and hence the more ignorant a man is, the less does he appreciate the value and importance of the winged hours. Who, that is acquainted with the delights of knowledge, with the value of reflection, and the charms of contemplation, but must hear with deep regret those who have never endeavored to profit by the past, complaining of the tardiness of time and sighing for the future? And why should man seek to pass his time in idleness, or in vain and unprofitable pursuits? Why neglect to cultivate the mental faculties which God has given him? He can plead no excuse in extenuation. Neither nature nor circumstance can furnish him with a sufficient apology for such delinquency. If deprived of the advantages of an early education, the more anxious and industrious should he be to obtain one. And if so fortunate as to have acquired more information than his neighbors, the more liberal he should be in the dispensation of his knowledge. Placed in a world, rife with interest, replete with curious varieties, and pregnant with unexplored phenomena, man is urged by every inducement, to acquaint himself as far as possible with the nature and designs of that creation of which he forms so interesting and important a feature. He is called upon by every consideration, to devote his time and his energies to the ascertainment and development of those truths, whether physical, political or moral, which concern the welfare of man; and he who neglects to perform those duties, contravenes, as far as in him lies, the purposes of his creation.

A blind veneration for antiquity, originating in the credulity and indolency of the human mind, is one great source of error and ignorance. Men find less trouble and labor in adopting the opinions of others, than in investigating and forming opinions of their own; and hence their willingness to follow in the footsteps of their ancestors. Too many men act upon the principle, that the antiquity of an opinion, or the universality with which it has been received is, an indubitable evidence of its truth, so long will they maintain and propagate error and falsehood. Would men but reflect that the indolent and ignorant have ever outnumbered the reasoning and intellectual; and that the more ancient an opinion, the nearer it approaches to the legendary and fabulous times, they would not so readily estimate its worth by the number of votaries, or the antiquity of existence. Shall I be told, that but comparatively few are capable of becoming habitual thinkers and correct reasoners—that nature has withheld her intellectual gifts from the great majority of her children, and decided that they should be governed and controlled by a chosen and favored few? Let no man so far presume to question the justice and goodness of the Universal Parent. I am aware however, that there exists a disparity in the minds and capacities of men; and I am also aware that that disparity arises in a great degree from the volition of the creature. Such is the habitual negligence of men, and so prone are they to trifles, that a majority of them feel a deeper interest in the displays of necromancy, than in the demonstrations of philosophy; and would listen with greater attention to the ravings of a fanatic, or the pratings of a parrot, than to the thunders of Sinai, or a voice from heaven. And why this abuse of reason, this poverty of mind and dereliction of thought? Does the cause necessarily exist in man's nature and constitution? By no means—but in his habits and his will. The majority of distinguished individuals, owe their elevation to native superiority of intellect. The truth of this position is strikingly exemplified in the life and achievement of Carsten Niebuhr. Born a peasant in a remote corner of an obscure province, far removed from all the facilities of acquiring information—poor and an orphan—gifted but moderately by nature—with a memory not remarkably retentive, and his ability of acquiring knowledge the most common—yet, notwithstanding all these unpropitious circumstances, he became by dint of perseverance and indefatigable industry, one of the most distinguished men of his age. His memory will survive and flourish—be honored and revered, whilst science has a friend, or virtue an admirer.

Of what benefit would the native genius of a Newton or a Liebnitz have been to themselves, or to the world, without the aid of method and mental industry? Not by intuition, but by the deductions of reason, was the latter enabled to discover the order of fluxions, or the differential calculus—and the former, the laws of universal gravitation. It was industry and mental discipline, that enabled the immortal Tully to sustain for a season, the fortunes of degenerate and sinking Rome—that enabled Napoleon to control the destinies of Europe—and Franklin to follow nature to her hiding place, and pluck the master secret from her bosom.

All men, when their jealousies and prejudices are quiescent, admire genius, and willingly do homage to intellectual greatness—nay, regard the master spirits of intelligence, as beings almost superhuman; and hence, the ancients deified their sages and benefactors—and hence, the moderns speak of Plato, as the divine—of Galileo and Kepler—of La Grange and La Place—of Milton and Shakespeare—of Jefferson and Franklin, as "the immortal." And is it not extraordinary, that men should idolize qualities in others, which they neglect to cultivate in themselves? Is it not strange, that the love of mental ease should, so often, nay, so generally, triumph over all the aspirations of a generous ambition—over every impulse, every desire for intellectual eminence?

Most men are willing to admit, (and feel a secret pride in the admission,) that when God said "Let us make man in our own image," he meant that the resemblance should consist in the intellectual character and qualifications of man. Admitting the correctness of this interpretation, it follows, that in proportion as we advance in knowledge, in that ratio do we approximate to the character and likeness of our Creator. And of consequence, as we remain stationary, or retrograde, do we assimilate to the brutes that perish. There are none but would startle with horror at the reflection, that they resembled in form and face, the ape or the elephant; and yet, strange and paradoxical as it may appear, the majority of mankind, rather than task their mental powers, would prefer to live and die resembling in mind and habits the ox and the ass. Be stimulated then, my friends, by the reflection, that every acquisition of knowledge, if properly applied, elevates your character, augments your happiness, and increases and strengthens your resemblance to your Creator. I would not have you understand, however, that the mere acquisition of knowledge, or what is generally called an education, is suffered to render you either wise or virtuous. Man is too apt to learn mechanically; and his knowledge when mechanical, is of but little more service or utility to him, than is the faculty of articulating certain words to the parrot or the jackdaw. Without severe mental training and an assiduous cultivation of the just powers of thought, and the strict but general regulation of the faculties of the mind, the great purposes of education are seldom if ever accomplished. He who has treasured up much information regardless of system, or method, is admirably described in the following couplet, by England's greatest didactic poet,

A bookful blockhead—ignorantly read,
With loads of learned lumber in his head.

The value of our acquirements depends, not so much upon their extent or variety, as upon the manner and capacity with which they are applied. When men learn how to think, they soon begin to think correctly. No precocity of genius—no expansion of native intellect—no acquisitions of knowledge, can render men wise and useful, without they know how to direct their power and use their wisdom. How strong the propriety then, nay, how imperative the duty, especially in a government like ours, where the public voice is omnipotent, where the destinies of the republic are committed to the hands of its citizens, where government is a deposit intrusted alike to all, and where all are accounted for the administration of its affairs, that all should be acquainted with its character and genius, and capable of investigating the causes that may secure its stability, or accelerate its destruction.

NOAH WEBSTER.

A beautiful closing scene of the well-spent life of an honored and practical votary to literary pursuits is exhibited in the following record:

Noah Webster, L. L. D., the veteran of American Literature, seems to be laying aside his armor, or rather after the manner of ancient heroes, suspending it in our temples of science. May he long enjoy the green old age in which he at present rests from his labors.

He has given to the library of Yale College, his Alma Mater, a number of rare and valuable books, Saxon, Russ, and Stalopic.

He has made a donation of classical and other books to the Library of Middlebury College, of which one of his sons-in-law was professor; among these is an elegant edition of Pliny's works in folio, which belonged to Lord Hardwick.

He has given a number of valuable books to the library of Amherst College in Massachusetts, of which he was one of the founders.

He has made a donation of miscellaneous works to the Proprietor's Library in Hartford, the original seat of his ancestors, the first of whom was one of the founders of the colony Connecticut. These books are now transfered to the library of the Young Men's Institute.

He also made a donation of books to trustees in West Hartford, the place of his nativity, for the purpose of beginning a social library; these are made the basis of such an institution as the donor intended.

THE BIBLE.

Whence but from heaven, could man unskill'd in arts—
In different nations born, in different parts—
Weave such agreeing truths! Or how, or why,
Should all conspire to cheat us with a lie?
Unasked their pains, ungrateful their advice,
Starving their gain, and martyrdom their prize.

Dryden.

GLEANINGS FROM THE CONVERSATIONS OF REV. JOHN NEWTON.

If two angels were sent down from heaven to execute the divine command, and one was appointed to conduct an empire, and the other to sweep a street, they would feel no inclination to change employments.

I should have thought mowers very idle people; but they work while they whet their scythes. So devotedness to God, whether it mows or whets the scythe still goes on with the work.

A Christian should never plead spirituality for being an idler or a sloven. If he be but a shoe black, he should be the best in the parish.

My principal method for defeating error and heresy is by establishing truth. One proposes to fill a bushel with tares—now if I can fill it first with wheat, I may defy his attempts.

A Christian in the world, is like a man transacting his affairs in the rain. He will not suddenly leave his business because it rains—but the moment that business is done, he is off—as is said in the Acts of the Apostles, "Being let go, they went to their own company."

Many have puzzled themselves about the origin of evil. I am content to observe that there is evil, and that there is a way of escape from it, and with this I begin and end.

Seldom will Satan come to the Christian, at first with a gross temptation. A green log and a candle may be safely left together. But bring a few shavings, and then some small sticks, and then some larger, and soon you may bring the green log to ashes.

I would not give a straw for that assurance which sin will not damp. If David had come from his adultery, talking of his assurance at that time, I should have despised his speech.

For an old Christian to say to a young one, "Stand in my evidence," is like a man who has with difficulty climbed by a ladder to the top of the house, crying to one at the bottom, "This is the place for a prospect—come up at a step."

I shall preach, perhaps, very usefully upon two opposite texts, so long as I keep them apart—but if I attempt to reconcile them where God has not done it, it is ten to one if I don't begin to bungle.

Christ has taken our nature into heaven to represent us. He has left us on earth, with his nature, to represent him.

A wise man looks upon men as he does on horses—all their caparisons of title, wealth, and place, he considers but as harness.

Some Christians, at first glance, seem of a superior order, when they are not. They want one quality. At a florist's exhibition the other day, a certain flower was determined to bear the bell, but it was found to be an artificial flower. There is a certain quality called growth which it had not.

Villany and Virtue.—Lacon among many things, says truly "villany that is vigilant, will be an overmatch for virtue, if she slumber on her post; and hence it is that a bad cause has often triumphed over a good one; for the partizans of the former, knowing that their cause will do nothing for them, have done every thing for their cause; whereas the friends of the latter are too apt to expect every thing from their cause and nothing from themselves."

Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall.

SCRAPS.

There is no labor so certainly effectual, and so largely productive as that which is expended in the work of the Lord.

The love of Christ should constrain you to live unto him, and not merely to speak well of him.

The viciousness of the wretched, so far from exempting us from obligation to supply their urgent necessities, is an additional reason why we should endeavor to do them good, win their confidence, and save their souls.

Few men had ever more natural courage than Luther, and yet he was often heard to say, that even to the latest part of his life, he never could conquer his fear when he mounted the pulpit.—Mason.

Christ's ministers must be careful, while they display God's wrath, to conceal their own, and be jealous over themselves, lest sinful anger shed itself under the cloak of zeal against sin.—M. Henry.

If in my preaching I were to pay a regard to Phillip Melancthon and other divines, then I should do little good. I preach in the plainest manner to the illiterate, and that gives content to all. Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, I spare till we learned ones come together.—Dr. Luther.

Much of the ability to do good lies in the disposition to do it. The very breathing of a benevolent heart is a species of doing good.

If the heart be cold in prayer, pray until it grows warm. To forsake the closet because you are not in a good frame, is to go away from the fire because you are cold.

Surely nature is a book, and every page rich with sweet hints. To an attentive mind the garden turns preacher, and its blooming tenants are so many lively sermons. What an engaging pattern, and what an excellent lesson have we here.—Hervey.

Gospel ministers are appointed rulers in the household of God; not as princes, for Christ has entered a caveat against that;—but as stewards, or other subordinate officers; not as lords, but as guides; not to prescribe new ways, but to lead in the ways that Christ has appointed.—Rev. Matthew Henry.

With a good minister of the Gospel, the end of one duty is the beginning of another. When Calvin was persuaded to remit his ministerial labors, he answered with some resentment, 'What, would you have my master find me idle?' Persevere in his work 'till the Lord come.' 'Hold fast till then.' 'Continue in these things.' 'Endure to the end, like a good soldier.'—Henry.

God be praised for the many stripings I have met with. It is good for me that I have been supplanted, despised, censured, maligned, judged by and separated from my nearest and dearest friends. By this I have found the faithfulness of Him who is the best of friends.—Whitefield.

Taste for Reading.—If I were to pray for a taste which should stand me in stead under every variety of circumstances, and be a source of happiness and cheerfulness to me through life, and a shield against its ills, however things might go amiss, and the world frown against me, it would be a taste for reading.—Sir J. Herschell.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

WASHINGTON LOVED HIS MOTHER.

Immediately after the organization of the present government, Gen. Washington repaired to Fredericksburg, to pay his duty to his mother, preparatory to his departure to New York. An affecting scene ensued. The son feelingly remarked the ravages which a tottering disease had made upon the aged frame of his mother, and thus addressed her:

"The people, madam have been pleased, with the most flattering unanimity, to elect me to the chief magistracy of the U. S., but before I can assume the functions of that office, I have come to bid you an affectionate farewell. So soon as the public business, which must necessarily be encountered in arranging a new government, can be disposed of, I shall hasten to Virginia and"——

Here the matron interrupted him.—"You will see me no more. My great age, and the disease that is fast approaching my vitals, warn me that I shall not be long in this world. I trust God, I am somewhat prepared for a better. But go, George, fulfill the high destinies which Heaven appears to assign you; go my son, and may Heaven's and your mother's blessing be with you always."

The President was deeply affected. His head rested upon the shoulder of his parent, whose aged arm feebly, yet fondly encircled his neck. That brow on which fame had wreathed the purest laurel virtue ever gave to created man, relaxed from its lofty bearing. That look which could have awed a Roman Senate, in its Fabrician day, was bent in filial tenderness upon the time-worn feature of this venerable matron.

The great man wept. A thousand recollections crowded upon his mind, carried him back to his paternal mansion, and the days of his youth; and there the centre of attraction was his mother, whose care, instruction, and discipline, had prepared him to reach the topmost height of laudable ambition; yet how were his glories forgotten while he gazed upon her from whom wasted by time, and malady, he must soon part to meet no more!

The matron's prediction were true. The disease, which had long preyed upon her frame, completed its triumph, and she expired at the age of eighty-five, confiding in the promises of immortality to the humble believer.

Remember this story, little children.—Washington, you know was a great man. I shall never expect to see any little boy become a great man who does not love his mother.

THE subscriber still keeps 'digging' away at Bureaus, Tables, Stands, and Bedsteads, and sometimes makes other work that folks want; but he don't think it best to go into a bill of particulars. Suffice it to say, that there will be kept on hand, or made to order, all kinds of Cabinet Ware in his line of business. Having been to some expense in obtaining experienced workmen, (that folks do say can't be beat in getting up, things nice,) he would invite those wishing to purchase articles cheap, durable and handsome, to "just drop in" the Ware Room ☞one door east of the Stone Store, and directly opposite the Post Office.

☞Most kinds of Lumber and Produce received in exchange for Furniture, and CASH not refused.

THE LARGEST NEWSPAPER IN NEW-YORK.

TERMS—Three Dollars per annum, or two copies for Five Dollars.

The publishers of THE EMPIRE STATE, having completed their arrangements for the Enlarged Series of that paper, will issue on Thursday, January 9th, the first number of the largest Newspaper ever published in New York. Having procured new materials wherewith to execute the printing in a style of elegance unsurpassed by any other newspaper—and having also secured such aid in the several departments, local and general, literary and political, of the paper, as to ensure its worth as a valuable FAMILY NEWSPAPER, the publishers offer it with entire confidence to the patronage of an enlightened public, and a full reliance upon their taste and discrimination for support.

We have chosen the title of "The Empire State," as expressive not only of our attachment to the interests of New York, but of the Union; for whatever interests New York, in a great degree, interests the Union—whether in prosperity or in adversity.—And, as the Empire City is the great centre of business and commerce of the country—the point also where Intelligence from the European World is first received, and from which it radiates throughout the Union; so is New York, in many respects, if not in all, the most eligible point for the establishment of a valuable National Newspaper, as the medium through which shall be diffused to the States and Territories of the Republic, the earliest Intelligence, general and political, from every part of the world.

* * * * *

The mammoth size of our paper enabling us to present weekly an amount of matter contained in no other paper—we shall labor to present such a variety, original and selected, as will suit the tastes of all classes. The Politician, the Moralist, the Farmer, the Mechanic, the Merchant, and Professional Man, the Student and the Antiquary, the lover of humor, and such as would unfold a "Map of the Busy World,"—each and all may find amusement and instruction in the ample pages of the Empire State.

Some prominent features will be given to the paper, not found in any other. The utmost pains will be taken to present, at the earliest date, all important intelligence from every State in the Union—to collect and preserve Statistics and Important Facts, civil, political, and miscellaneous—to give full accounts of the proceedings of Congress, and of the Legislatures of the States—the best Speeches of distinguished American Orators and Statesmen—Memoirs of Eminent Men—Original Tales, Essays, and Poetry—Collections in the History and Antiquities of the Country—Improvements in Agriculture, and the Arts—Gems from the Current Literature of the Day—Notices of all New Works worthy of commendation—and Occurrences at Home and Abroad, commercial, monetary, or of whatever nature that can be of interest to the mass of readers throughout the country.

More, perhaps, we need not say—but submit our labors to the candid judgment of the public.

TERMS OF THE EMPIRE STATE.

FROM THE FRENCH OF A. VINET.

It is with the heights of the soul as with the magnificence of the firmament. When, in a clear night, millions of stars glitter on the brow of heaven, the dazzling richness of the starry vault, ravishes every eye; but it is in vain for him to whom Providence has denied sight, that he has his mind open to the most lofty conceptions; it is in vain that his intellectual capacity far surpasses that of all other men; all his intelligence, and all the power which he may have still added to his rare faculties, by study, will not help him, in the least, to form an idea of that delightful spectacle: while at his side, a man without talent or cultivation, has only to half open his eye-lids in order to take in with a glance, and to appropriate to himself, in a measure, all the splendor of the firmament, and to receive into his soul, through the medium of his eyes, impressions which such a spectacle cannot fail to produce.

Another heaven, a heaven more magnificent than the azure vault stretched out over our heads, is displayed to our vision in the gospel. Divine truths are the stars in that mystical heaven, and shine there more brilliant and pure than the stars in the firmament; but it needs an eye to see them, and that eye is Love. The gospel is a work of love; christianity is nothing but love realised under the purest form; and as the light of this world can only be known by the eye, so love can only be comprehended by love.

You may have exhausted the powers of your reason and the resources of your knowledge, to establish the authenticity of the scriptures; you may have explained to admiration the apparent contradictions of the holy books; you may have seized the chain of the capital truths of the gospel; you may have done all this, but if you have not love, the gospel will not only be a dead letter and a sealed book to you; its revelations will only appear to you abstractions, and simple ideas, its system, only a speculation, unique in its kind. Who knows but that all that the gospel contains, the most attracting, precious and sweet, will only seem to you an arbitrary conception, a fatiguing test of your credulity, and nothing more!

But let love step in between the gospel and the human soul, a sweet, gracious, and luminous interpreter, and the words of the gospel will have a sense, a sense as clear as it is deep; then the mind will be set at liberty and at ease in the midst of the strangest revelations; then those truths which we may have received by submission and obedience, will become as familiar to us, as necessarily true, as common truths, during all the days of our existence; than we shall penetrate that wonderful system which our reason, if we may so say, fears to examine too closely, under a confused apprehension of being tempted to infidelity; then, perhaps, we shall be astonished that we had not, before all revelation, foreseen, discovered, and known, that such a system was necessary for the glory of God and the well being of humanity. THE FIRST AWAKENED IN A REVIVAL.

In a church with which the writer was acquainted, destitute at the time of a pastor, but not without some members who walked with God, the following fact occurred:—A young lady, in making a visit to one of her acquaintance, took an unfrequented path through a deeply shaded grove, and as the day was very warm, after pursuing her walk some distance up a somewhat steep acclivity, she stopped to rest her on a beautiful mossy bank. While seated there, the tones of a human voice very unexpectedly broke upon her ear. On turning her eye the way from whence it came, she saw Deacon M——on horse back, making his way up the same hill. The thought occurred to her that she would retire from the sight of the road, let him pass, and remain undiscovered. This she did. As Dea. M——approached leisurely on his horse, she was wondering what could be his object in being so busily employed in talking to himself, as she could distinctly discover that no fellow mortal accompanied him. As he drew nearer and she could hear his voice more plainly, she ascertained that he was engaged in prayer. The only sentence that left a distinct impression on her mind was, "O Lord, have mercy on the dear youth in this place." He passed on praying, till the sounds which came from his lips died away on her ear. But an impression was made upon her heart, as it may be hoped, which will never die away, but prepare her to mingle in the symphonies of the redeemed in ascribing salvation to God and the Lamb. A new discovery respecting Christians was at the instant made to her. "Is this the manner," she reflected with herself, "in which they live, and pass on their way about the town? Do they thus pray for the youth? How unlike to a Christian have I lived? I have never prayed in this manner, I have seldom thought of the souls of others, and cared but very little for my own. While others pray for me, I live without prayer for myself."

Her sins, particularly her neglect of prayer to Him who is every where, now became a distressing burden to her. Soon, we have had reason to hope, there was joy among the angels of God over her as a penitent, and over many others in the town. She was the first awakened in a revival.—Pastor's Journal.

THE DAY OF JUDGMENT.

All the senates that ever were convened, and all the assemblies that ever met upon business or pleasure; all the armies that ever were conducted into the field, and all the officers who conducted them; in a word, all the men and women that shall have lived, from the first pair to their last born son and daughter, are to appear together, and take their respective trials at the day of the great assize. High and low, rich and poor, learned and unlearned, will then be distinguished only by their virtues and vices; so that the whole world shall perceive and acknowledge that "God is no respector of persons." The injured virgin, the afflicted widow, and the oppressed orphan, shall see those, face to face, who have spoiled them of their innocence, their reputation, or their substance.—There men shall meet all those who have seduced them, or whom they have seduced into the ways of sin; and all those who have directed and encouraged to proceed in the paths of righteousness. From the former they shall turn away with shame and fear; the latter they shall behold with joy and rejoicing. There they shall view the wisdom of religion in the persons of the righteous, and wonder why they did not see it before, and give themselves up to the study of it; there they shall clearly behold the folly of irreligion in the persons of the wicked, and be astonished at their insensibility in following so hard after it. Amidst all this unimaginable multitude, there shall not be one idle and unconcerned spectator; not one shall have leisure to trouble himself with the affairs of his neighbor. Every man will have a cause to be heard, and how will he be straitened until it be determined.—Bishop Horne.

CHRISTIAN SENTENCES.

(Collated by Ralph Venning, 1653.)

If we cannot raise our estates to our mind, we should lower our minds to our estates.

Passion makes those to be fools who otherwise are not so, and shows those to be fools who are so.

Many men think themselves wise, yea wiser than others, who indeed are inferior to them; for the most self-wise are the greatest fools.

That man hath no good-will that wills no good.

While we are paying God our debts, we make ourselves the more his debtors.—Lord, let me be thus in debt! The more we pay him the more we owe him, seeing we give nothing to him but what he gives first to us.

That man is less troubled who hath nothing to lose, than he who hath lost what he had, though they both have nothing.

This is the misery of great ones, that their greatness will not let them see how little, how nothing, both they and their greatness are.

A Christian need to walk circumspectly, lest he give them that are without an occasion to offend, or them that are within an occasion of offence.

Some men, when they have prayed against sin, go and sin against prayer.

Many complain of their suffering without a cause, wherein they should rather rejoice, for it is better to suffer without a cause than that there should be a cause for our suffering.

Grace worketh strongly, and therefore God is said to draw; and it worketh sweetly too, and therefore man is said to come.

Men's lusts are their gods on earth, but they will be their tormentors in hell.

Some men set their hearts on that, on which God would that they set only their feet, namely, the earth.

The sweetness of divine things is not in the hearing, or praying for, or talking of; but in the having and enjoyment of them.

When we have done our duty, we are but unprofitable servants; for our best is so bad, and our all so little, that it is but little more than nothing at all.

We cannot be said to glorify God, though we do the things that glorify him, unless we do those things to glorify him.

He is not learned in religion who knows all the matters that ought to be known; but he who knows them in the manner how they ought to be known.

Though it grieve a poor soul that Christ was pierced by him; yet it relieves a poor soul that Christ was pierced for him.

A saint hath the law of God in his heart, and hath his heart in the law of God.

We are so far from being able to pay the utmost farthing, that the utmost we are able to pay amounts not to a farthing.

The house in which no altar to God is raised, wants both a foundation and a covering.

The gospel of peace is a great blessing, but the peace of the gospel is a greater blessing.

Nothing disgraceth a man so much as sin, and nothing honors a man so much as grace.

Gratitude is like the incense of the Jewish priest, which, while it did honor to God, did likewise regale with its own fragrance the person by whom it was offered.—Doddridge.

CONVERSION OF A LAWYER AT NUNDA, ALLEGANY COUNTY, N. Y.

An Attorney, who is well known as having been far from the kingdom of Christ and whose opposition was for several days very great was subdued by the power of grace, and has become an humble and zealous Christian, and a determined Advocate of the cause of the blessed Redeemer. He frankly and publicly says that he has borne the highest insignia of office in Satan's kingdom, and that he is a fresh witness right from the camp of the enemy. The first day after his conversion, he went through the street, taking his old comrades by the hand, and asking them to receive a word kindly, from their former associate. To some who said, "you are crazy," he replied—"when you think I am in my right mind, come and talk with me on this subject. You know what I have been—now I tell you there is a reality in the Christian religion."—His anguish was almost unutterable at times during his conviction, and after his conversion he could not sleep for joy. He says to sinners, "Command me in any way you please—my time, my resources, my life, if you will but come to Christ." Surely, this is the work of the Lord, and marvelous in our eyes. O, may it extend throughout the land.—Zion's Watch Tower.

HYMN.

COMPOSED BY CHARLES GRANT, ESQ., IN OLD AGE AND SICKNESS.

With years oppressed, with sorrows worn'
Dejected, harassed, sick, forlorn;
To thee, O God, I pray!
To thee, these withered hands arise,
To thee, I lift these failing eyes,
Oh, cast me not away.

Thy mercy heard my infant prayer,
Thy love with all a mother's care,
Sustained my childish days;
Thy goodness watched my ripening youth,
And formed my soul to love thy truth,
And filled my heart with praise.

O Savior, has thy grace declined?
Can years affect the Eternal Mind?
Or time its love decay?
A thousand ages pass thy sight,
And all their long and weary flight,
Is gone like yesterday.

Then' even in age and grief, thy name,
Shall still my languid heart inflame,
And bow my faltering knee?
O yet this bosom feels thy fire,
This trembling hand and drooping lyre,
Have yet a strain for thee.

Yes, broken, tuneless, still, O Lord!
This voice transported shall record
Thy bounty, tried so long?
Till sinking slow, with calm decay,
Its feeble murmurs melt away,
Into a seraph's song.

JOHN NEWTON.

Two or three years before the death of this eminent servant of Christ, when his sight became so dim that he was no longer able to read, an aged friend and brother in the ministry, now living, and by whom this anecdote was related, called on him to breakfast. Family prayer succeeding, the portion of the Scripture for the day was read to him. A part of it, was the expression, "By the grace of God I am what I am." It was the good man's custom on these occasions to make a few brief and familiar remarks on the passage read. After the reading of this text, he paused for some moments, and then uttered the following affecting soliloquy:

"I am not what I ought to be; ah! how imperfect and deficient! I am not what I wish to be. I abhor what is evil, and would cleave to all that is good! I am not what I hope to be; for soon shall I put off this mortality, and with it all sin and imperfection! But though I am not what I ought to be, nor what I wish to be, nor what I hope to be, I can truly say I am not what I once was—the slave of sin and Satan; and I can most heartily join with the Apostle in saying 'By the grace of God I am what I am.' Let us pray.

RELIGION, HOLINESS.

It will cost something to be religious; it will cost more not to be so.

A desire for happiness is natural; a desire of holiness is supernatural.

He that doeth good unwillingly, doeth wickedly: such a one is sufficiently rewarded if God pardon his obedience.

Men omit duties not so much because they want time for them, as well inclined hearts towards them; hence that saying of a great Christian; "Let God give me a heart to do my duty, and I shall find time for it."

If God's children desire temporal comforts without an immediate view to holiness, it is no wonder that their Father disappoints them: for this view in every thing is their sanctification.

If a man lives and dies a mere professor, he had better have lived and died a mere heathen.

GOD.—Though suns be tossed from their centre, and planets be hurled to ruin; though world be piled on world, and dread disorder reign; though the heavens be rolled together as a scroll, and the elements melt with fervent heat; yet let us not forget that there is one Being, who, unchanged himself, beholds the changes of the universe with a perfect command of all its powers, and that Being is "our Father who is in Heaven."

THE HEATHEN AND THE PROFESSOR OF CHRISTIANITY.

ORIENTAL ANECDOTE.—A recaptured African, a resident at New-Georgia, a professor of religion, stopped at Heddington one Saturday lately, while on his way to the Goulah country, on a trading journey. He visited the Rev. Mr. Brown, the missionary stationed here, and after family prayers, fell in conversation with King Tom, among whose people (chiefly Pyrahs) that mission station has commenced. "Where are you going from here?" asked the king. "To the Goulah country." "When do you leave?" "To-morrow morning!"—"To-morrow morning?" repeated Tom in much surprise. "To morrow morning! To-morrow be God's day, it be Sunday. Brown tell us no man must work, travel, or go to see his friends on Sunday; you can't leave my town—you must stop till next day; what will my people say when they see you, a God man go on your way to-morrow? No, no; you must stop here—come with us to hear God palaver; and as to eat we have plenty, we give you." It is needless to add, he was ashamed and did not proceed.

How many in Christendom will find themselves reproved by this heathen king at the judgment seat of Christ.—Afric's Luminary.

IMPROVEMENT OF MORTALITY.

"One of the ancients, standing at Cæsar's tomb, wept and cried, 'Where is now the flourishing beauty of Cæsar? What is become of his magnificence? Where are the armies now? Where are now the victories, the triumphs, and trophies, of Cæsar?"—Caryl on Job.

How happy the Christian when he dies! He goes to live with Christ. He rises above the world, to perfect, unfading honor and happiness. O Christian! seek those honors and treasures which are to be found in Christ, and in the pursuit and practice of true godliness. Thy dwelling on earth may be mean, and thy grave unnoticed; but thou shalt have a mansion in the skies, while, in the most important and pleasing sense, thy name shall be had in remembrance.

THE PLEASURE OF GOOD HABITS.—The Providence of God has so ordered the course of things, that there is no action, the usefulness of which has made it a matter of duty, and of a profession, but a man may bear the continual pursuit of it, without loathing or satiety.

The same shop and trade that employs a man in his youth, employs him in old age. Every morning he rises fresh to his hammer and his anvil; he passes the day singing; custom has naturalized his labor to him; his shop is his element, and he cannot, with any enjoyment of himself, live out of it. Whereas no custom can make the painfulness of a debauch easy or pleasing to a man; since nothing can be pleasant that is unnatural.

But now, if God has interwoven such a pleasure with the works of our ordinary calling, how much superior and more refined must that be, that arises from a survey of a pious and well governed life? Surely as much as Christianity is nobler than a trade. —South.

My temporal estate is mean and low, yet I am contented with it, and humbly bless God for what I have. I live in as narrow a compass for expenses as I can, that I may have something to give to the poor, and to be helpful to those that are in need, according to my ability. And as God hath required of us to love mercy; and our Savior hath said, "It is a more blessed thing to give, than to receive;" so I have more pleasure in giving a portion to the needy, as far as my mean estate will bear, than in laying out for the delight of my own sense, or worldly conveniences. And this proceeds not from a conceit of merit in any thing that I can do, but from a love to please God and to do good.—Corbett.

FOR THE MINISTER.

MINISTERS OF THE GOSPEL AT THE LAST DAY

Dear brethren, our office is no ordinary one. We are embassadors from the King of kings and Lord of lords to a revolted world. Never had men committed to them an embassy of such deep and everlasting moment. No work ever undertaken by mortals was so important, so solemn, or connected with such amazing consequences. Among all the thousands to whom we preach, not one but what will take an impression from us that will never wear out. The fate of millions through succeeding generations depends on our faithfulness.—Heaven and hell will forever ring with recited memorials of our ministry. And Oh, our own responsibility. There is for us no middle destiny. Our stake is for a higher throne of glory, or for a deeper hell. For, to say nothing of the souls committed to our care, our work leads to the altar. Our home is by the side of the Shekinah. We have daily to go where Nadab and Abdihu went, and to transact with Him who darted his lightning upon them. It is a solemn thing to stand so near the holy Lord God. Let us beware how, by unhallowed fervors, we bring false fire before the Lord. Let us not fail to devote to our work our best powers, our unceasing application, consecrated by unremitting prayer. Anything rather than careless preparations for the pulpit, and a sleeping performance of it. Forget your father, forget your mother, but forget not this infinite work of God Soon we shall appear with our respective charges before the judgment seat of Christ. What a scene will then open between a pastor and his flock, when all his official conduct towards them shall be scrutinized, and all their treatment of him and his gospel shall be laid open; when it shall appear that an Omnipresent eye followed him into his study every time he sat down to write a sermon, and traced every line upon his paper, and every motion of his heart; and followed him into the pulpit, and watched every kindling desire, every drowsy feeling, every wandering thought, every reach after fame. Ah! my dear brethren, when you hear on the right hand the songs of bursting praise that you ever had existence, and on the left hand behold a company of wretched spirits, sending forth their loud lament that you had not warned them with a stronger voice, will you not regret that all your sermons were not more impassioned, and all your prayers more agonizing? But what is this that I see? A horrid shape more deeply seared with thunder than the rest, around which a thousand dreadful beings, with furious eyes and threatening gestures, are venting their raging curses? It is an unfaithful pastor, who went down to hell with most of his congregation; and those around him are the wretched beings whom he has decoyed to death. My soul turns away, and cries, Give me poverty, give me the curses of a wicked world, give me the martyr's stake; but, O my God save me from unfaithfulness to thee and the souls of men.—Dr. Griffin.

FOR PARENTS.

DOMESTIC DISCIPLINE.

We may say that much of that scolding and threatening of some parents, many of those corrections which are inflicted in passion and selfishness, and some of the restraints and prohibitions of unwise and unkind parents are intended; and even the instructions and warnings of some parents which are so unhappily managed, as to provoke rather than to persuade. The great defect is the want of love and tenderness in doing all these things—the want of an earnest desire for the children's eternal welfare—the want of a deep feeling of apprehension for immortal souls. What one of the ancients said to a Christian minister, "love your people, and then you may say just what you please to them," is equally true of parents. If love, not selfishness, or passion dictate, they may say or do almost any thing, and their children will love and honor them for it. Indeed so clearly is God on the side of nurture or correction, that he sanctifies and blesses it even when administered very imperfectly. Thus, when St. Paul in his Epistle to the Hebrews, is speaking of our Heavenly Father's wise and gracious chastisements, he says, "Furthermore, we have had fathers after our flesh who corrected us, and we gave them reverence; shall we not much rather be in subjection to the Father of spirits and live. For they verily for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure; but he for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness"—that is, they chastened us perhaps in anger, or merely for some earthly end, and not with a view to our soul's immortal welfare—and yet even for that, we feel some reverence for them—it was not without its wholesome influence. The truth is that as any form of religion or civil government is better than atheism or anarchy, so any correction or government is better than a child left to himself, which will assuredly bring his mother to shame, and perhaps the gray hairs of his father with sorrow to the grave.

When our Heavenly Father would inflict his great, his final, his overwhelming judgment on any one, he just leaves him to himself—withdraws his grace—says to the spirit let him alone; so an earthly parent cannot do a greater injury to a child, than to let him have his own way; and for this plain reason that the way of every child by nature leads to death. To permit such a poor corrupt creature as man to have his own way is cruel indeed in those who have power to prevent it. We fear that those who reason against an early and effective discipline, do not really believe or truly understand the doctrine of human depravity. That doctrine admitted, and the scheme of indulgence becomes the most wicked and unnatural treatment of which parents can be guilty.

Perhaps some may say, we only differ as to the mode of effecting their good. We think that resistance and correction only strengthen the evil tendencies; and that we had better avoid the contest, waiting awhile until reason has assumed her sway, and then we will address the language of argument and persuasion. But what if meanwhile our wills are becoming more and more perverse, our passions stronger and stronger, and our habits more fixed through indulgence; what will the feeble voice of reason avail against them? As well whisper to the wind and say to the storm "be still." We had better try and find out God's way of doing this thing. He is a Father, the oldest, the wisest and the best, who has trained up many sons for Glory and can tell us how it should be done. He has already told us not merely by his word, but by certain principles deeply implanted in our natures, whose testimony is too strong to be resisted.—Bishop Meade.

The best portion we can desire for our children, is an interest in Christ—the most honorable connections, that they be fellow-citizens with the saints—the most important learning, that they are taught to know and serve God.

"WHAT AM I IN MY OWN FAMILY."

The important, though simple question—"What am I in my own family?" has so frequently forced itself upon me in moments of serious reflection, that I am induced to lay before your readers my thoughts upon it. When visiting christian friends on certain joyful anniversaries, and conversing with them on things that accompany salvation, it has occurred to me that they are disposed to form too high an estimate of my religious character. Admitting my sincerity in the sight of an all seeing God, still I could not but painfully feel, that these dear brethren now see me to a great advantage, and at a distance from the cares and trials inseparable from the domestic state; and consequently find me more calm, more cheerful, and perhaps more spirited, than I really am under other and ordinary circumstances. When thus mixing with the excellent of the earth, I had moreover a character to maintain, as a professed Christian; and on that account also, I might be led to walk more circumspectly. Not that the eye, even of the holiest of men, ought to influence a believer in comparison with the eye of God; yet so deep is the natural corruption of the human heart and so subtile the devices of the adversary, that not a few of those who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, will confess that the arrival of some eminent Christian at their door has supplied that stimulous to spirituality which ought to have been furnished by the consideration, 'Thou, Lord, seest me.'

When, therefore, these christian brethren, at whose houses we occasionally reside, not only admit our sincerity, but even admire our piety, and speak of it in terms of somewhat, high commendation, is it not needful to inquire seriously, at a throne of grace, 'What am I in my own family?' For every one must admit the difference between manifesting a religious character in the social circle, and sustaining it in the domestic. In the former, every thing may occur to promote our temporal comfort and excite our Christian cheerfulness: our will, perhaps, is not opposed; our inclinations are not thwarted; our temper is not tried. In the latter, our children and domestics may do something that is contrary to our will, thwart our inclination, and seriously try our temper. How indispensable, then, is the inquiry, 'Am I that real saint at home, that I am supposed to be abroad?'

How vast is our obligation to walk, in the presence of our household, consistently with our serious profession, and how beneficial are the effects of our consistency on their minds and manners, are points too clear to demand any proof. Our children and servants will at least form a higher estimate of the value of vital Cristianity, when they can daily trace its ascendency in our own life and conversation.

On the contrary, they will too naturally form false estimates of our religion, if they observe no such results. In the latter case, the injury done to a family, in their immortal interests, cannot be adequately conceived till the day of universal judgment.—Lon. Chris. Obs.

FOR THE YOUNG CHRISTIAN.

From the Presbyterian.

ERROR OF YOUNG CHRISTIANS.

The first acquisition of the true principles of religion is usually attended with a very serious error respecting their subsequent operations. Young Christians generally entertain a vague opinion, that, when they have once started in the race, there will be few obstacles to retard their progress: that the difficulty in beginning is the only formidable one they will have to encounter: and that, having once named the name of Christ, it will be comparatively easy to depart from all iniquity. The first feelings of a youthful convert are of a character to strengthen this pleasing delusion: a glorious light has dawned upon his mind; fresh and healthful affections move his bosom; he sees the glories of heaven and the vanities of the world strongly contrasted; he has received new energies, which in their first exercise seem like the wielding of a two edged sword, before which no man can stand; the temptations of the world seem extinguished or powerless, and the kingdom of heaven is, as it were, in his very grasp. The commencement of this new career is so delightful, that it would be difficult to persuade him that there can be any unpleasant change; and hence, in the conscious possession of glowing feelings, the young convert wonders to see more matured disciples desponding, doubting, and mourning over the power of in-dwelling corruption, and not unfrequently charges them with insincerity or unfaithfulness. Secretly, at least, they are disposed to say, why do they not feel our warmth of zeal, our ardor of affection, our bold determination to press into the kingdom of heaven?

This enthusiasm,—we use the word in its best sense—is much sobered by experience. The young soldier who in his first battle dashes into the thickest of the fight, as if, with his single arm he could annihilate a regiment of foes, is sobered by a few severe wounds; and although he looses not his courage, yet, under the guidance of experience, he afterwards entertains a moderate opinion of his own prowess, and engages in the battle with greater circumspection, and deals out his blows with more prudence and judgement. So with the young Christian; in his first onset he dashes in advance of the veteran warriors, imagines perhaps that they are deficient in courage and loyalty; but when he has tried the strength of his foes, he learns to be more wary and less self-confident.

We are far from saying that the first impressions of young converts are a delusion, but they are often associated with a delusion. The joy is spiritual, the zeal genuine, the love holy; but it is delusive to suppose that they are to meet with no checks and drawbacks. The Lord in his condescending goodness is generally pleased to entertain the returning prodigal with the choicest provisions of his house; it is at first a time of feasting; but when this indulgence has been granted, and the prodigal has become domesticated in the family, he must expect to take his share in the labor, to exercise self-denial, and to encounter many things which are not the most agreeable to the flesh. Those who enlist in the army of Christ are not to expect the ease and security of peaceful times, but the difficulties and dangers of actual warfare. The spiritual enemies that we are taught to expect may apparently retire before the youthful soldier who has for the first time buckled on his armor, and leave him to imagine that he has effectually discomfited them; but they do it only to watch for an advantage; when they see him off his guard, and intoxicated with a supposed victory, they pour in their shafts thick upon him, and bring his towering hopes to the dust.

On this subject young converts need counsel, we would not venture, as some do, to say, you must expect your ardor to cool, and your love to abate, for they should anticipate no such reverse; and instead of regarding such a change as a matter of course, they should dread it as highly criminal; but we would say, regard the Christian life not as a holiday enjoyment, but as a warfare in which the courage will be tried, and the powers of endurance taxed, and laborious and painful service demanded. It would be strange, indeed, if the malignant powers of hell should permit any one quietly to enter the kingdom of heaven; it is not to be expected; it never has occurred, and never will. The three great foes will employ the very formidable influence they possess to detach the heart from God, and he is a fool who pretends to despise their power. They will use their blandishments, flatteries, and enchantments; they will appeal to the senses and excite the imagination; they will insinuate themselves into every secret place of the heart, and endeavor to give a direction to each of its feelings; they will beguile with subtlety, and employ all the deceivableness of unrighteousness; and in a thousand inconceivable ways, will attempt to diminish the obligations of religion, and lead from the practice of its duties. To be ignorant of their devices is to be exposed to a deadly battery without a shelter. There must be a contest. The glorious crown is only to be won by successful conflict. Every step towards heaven is to be achieved by struggle and conquest.

Young converts should be apprised that God has so ordered the Christian life, that the power of sin is to be weakened, and advances in holiness made only by successive and well-directed efforts. Bad habits are not overcome, or good ones confirmed, in a moment. A knowledge of the human heart, of its weaknesses, its depravity, and its dependence, is to be acquired by encountering temptations, and the goodness of God, and the abounding love of Christ, by a happy escape from them. It is necessary, in every point of view, that the Christian should be tried, and that in his way to heaven he should encounter much tribulation; and he that supposes that he is exempt from these, is in his hopes of religion a self-deceiver.

Does the young Christian respond to this, by saying that such a representation is discouraging? And why discouraging? Is not heaven worth the struggle? Will a painful pilgrimage of a few years be comparable with the glory to be revealed? Is it not enough that God, who is for us, is greater than all that can be against us? that severe as the struggle may be, the victory is certain? Yes, let the Christian know that, in preparing for the conflict, he prepares for the victory.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Register.

Dear Brethren—Having seen in your first number, among notices of revivals of religion, a remark relative to my recent visit in Berlin, and the religious excitement in that vicinity, with a request that I would give more particular information respecting it; I will therefore send you a brief statement of my labors in that society, and the apparent results.

From a request of the church in Berlin, made to me by brother Satterlee, I visited them, and commenced preaching in Berlin on the 11th of January, and until the 16th I visited and preached in the adjacent neighborhood. From this time our meetings were held daily at the S. D. B. house in the village. The first day Baptist brethren were invited to unite with the seventh day brethren, to hold jointly a series of meetings, in order to obtain a happier state of [illegible] among themselves, and a greater degree of piety towards God. Our meetings were held morning and evening for [illegible] days in succession, with the [illegible] omission of the morning service. [illegible] eight or ten days, the prospect of making any very serious impressions upon the impenitent was discouraging, [illegible] that many of the brethren thought [illegible] to discontinue the protracted exercises; although there had been from the [illegible] of the meeting a good degree [illegible] in prayer and exhortation [illegible] brethren, without distinction [illegible]. And I add with great [illegible] brethren, Elders Satterlee, Estee, Gifford, and Haridon, and others who occasionally attended, manifested a very laudable anxiety for a revival of the work of grace in the churches, and I believe that in no instance did they withhold any assistance or encouragement which it was in their power to afford.

It appeared for a long time, that the enemies of Jesus Christ had clubbed together, and joined their strength in order to oppose any good effect of the meeting upon their own minds. But it was also very apparent that the Spirit of God was closely besetting them in their strong holds, and undermining the ground on which they were standing. These appearances, and the cheering expressions of a faithful sister, who said, 'Don't give them up, for God has a blessing for us yet, if we will continue to seek for it,' encouraged us to continue our labors.

At the close of our protracted exercises there were probably about thirty persons who gave pleasing indications that they were in earnest about their soul's salvation. A number had obtained a hope that their names were written in the Book of Life; four were baptized, and five were added, two to the seventh day, and three to the first day church; and there was evidently an increasing seriousness in the assembly.—This was the state of the work when the continuous meetings closed. Since that time I have received information from a Christian brother in Berlin, under date of March 8th, who says, "The excitement among the people in this place continues about the same as when you was here.—There has been baptizing twice, three persons at each time, and I understand four are to be baptized to-day. The good Spirit has taken hold of a number of hard heads, who have been constrained to confess the follies of their past lives, and to request the prayers of Christians: some of the number have been for the year past very dissipated." Thus it appears that, although this work at first was tardy in its progress, and attended with unusual discouragements; it is not as rapid in its decline as religious excitements sometimes are. Before I left Berlin, I thought I discovered a wide-spread seriousness which would ultimate in great good to the moral interests of the inhabitants of that 'lone valley of the mountains.' The additions to the churches, although they are not numerous, and the greater number of these are to the first day Baptist church, yet they afford us occasion for devout gratitude to the only prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God; and encouragement for using faithfully, diligently, and perseveringly, those evangelical means for promoting the religious interests of our fellow men, which the holy scriptures suggest to us. And since neither the ancient nor modern history of the church affords any instance of a failure, in which the church has scripturally labored for a revival of religion; so no community of christians can be excusable while they supinely yield to the blighting influence of a religious declension. If christians are in darkness, they should pray for light. If they are weak, they should pray for strength. If ignorant of their duty, they should ask wisdom of God, who giveth to all liberally. If their religious feelings decline under the ordinary attendance upon their duties, they should give extraordinary attention to them; and if the means of grace in common use are found insufficient to keep up a proper state of religious anxiety among us, we should resort to such as are uncommon; and the scriptures will afford us an ample store of them. If they are afflicted with difficulties and divisions among them, they should follow the example of God's ancient people,—they should cry humbly to God; and diligently use all proper means for their restoration to a more happy condition. From the uniform encouragement given us, both from God's gracious promises, and from his prompt fulfilment of them to all who believe and obey Him; it is anxiously desired that none of our churches will any longer disregard the divine admonitions, Eph. v. 14. "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light."

Yours, in christian love,

FOR THE AGED.

"Even to hoar hairs will I carry you."

The religion of the Bible is of inestimable value to all its votaries. It is a guide to the young; an ornament to those of maturer years, and a support to the aged.—It is a light which neither adversity nor persecution can extinguish; a treasure of which no avarice nor power can deprive its possessor. It is the soul of enjoyment in prosperity, and a never-failing source of comfort in affliction and distress. The divine promises and the consolations of this holy religion are eminently suited to the circumstances of the aged. Many considerations conspire to render its enjoyment to them peculiarly desirable. The vivacity of youth and the strength of manhood have passed away, and with these the companions of their earlier years. Friends have either died, proved faithless, or removed from their society. Children have left them in pursuit of wealth or fame; and perhaps, in some cases, have wrung their feelings by dishonorable or criminal conduct. In addition to the above, which might be deemed sufficient to detach their affections from earth, they labor under the decrepitude and infirmities of accumulated years; and, as they feel themselves to be approaching the grave and the judgment, it is wise to bestow such attention on the subjects connected with the future and unchanging state of existence to which they hasten, as their importance demands. The circumstances of the pious in advanced life, are truly interesting. They can retrospect their whole lives, and summon to their recollection such an array of Providential dealings as to excite in them the liveliest gratitude; and frequently they feel constrained to say, "Hitherto the Lord hath helped."

The Bible warrants the conclusion that the aged pious are the peculiar subjects of the Divine solicitude and care. This assurance has been a strong consolation to the servants of God in all ages. David refers to this when he says to his Maker, "Forsake me not now when I am old and gray-headed." God had been his strength in youth, and now that he felt his "flesh and heart fail," he urges his own dependence and the former loving kindnesses of the Lord, with resistless eloquence in his plea, for the Divine support in the trying hour.—The pious patriarchs were generally favored with a presentiment of their departure from earth to the paradise of God.—Their last hours were peculiarly happy—nay, triumphant. Their tongues were tuned by the spirit of inspiration to reveal the most important truths, to recount the merciful dealings of God with them, and to bless and encourage the church of God in after ages by their pious effusions. How favored was the lot of Enoch and Elijah, who were allowed to enter Heaven without passing through the gates of death in the ordinary way. How privileged was Moses, and Aaron, and Stephen, and others, who in the hour of their exit from this world, held intimate communion with their Maker, and were transported with a view of the glories of the kingdom they were entering! But perhaps it will be said, Christians are not always permitted to enter their rest thus triumphantly. This is, indeed, true. And neither did the Lord of glory, who was made a sacrifice for sin, and who for our sakes vanquished death in its own dominion, choose to exempt himself from its pains and sufferings. What a contrast between the death of Stephen and his Master!—The latter complains of being forsaken by his disciples—betrayed by a professed friend—nay, even forsaken by his Father!—The former, though suffering a violent death, feels the Divine support—sees heaven opened—and beholds the triumphant Jesus, who had trodden the awful wine-press alone, now ready to place on his head the first crown ever worn by a Christian Martyr! And will our aged friends say, that it is not a privilege to them to be permitted to embrace the Savior in the arms of faith, at the hour of death, as did Simeon? Or will they say that it was the person of the Redeemer that Simeon beheld and embraced? Such, indeed, was the fact; but let it be remembered that the Divinity and Messiahship of Christ are established by so many infallible proofs, that there are less obstacles to the exercise of faith at present, than when the holy man recognized in the infant eight days old the anointed of God, the Savior of the world. Is not the promise of Jehovah able to sustain you, when he says "Even to hoar hairs will I carry you"?—that he will not forsake you?—that he will look with interest on the closing scene of your earthly existence, and pronounce even your death precious in his sight!

Aged Christian! To what a glorious destiny are you tending! Soon the veil which hangs "'twixt mortal and immortal being," shall be removed, and those eyes which are now dim'd by age shall behold with unspeakable rapture the object of your affections, the Savior, "whom having not seen, ye now love; in whom though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory."—Those limbs which the weight of years has palsied, shall possess immortal vigor—and those voices now feeble and tremulous, shall be forever strong to chant the glories of your King. But before you "go hence to be no more seen," we ask you to make an effort to resuscitate the languishing church of the living God.—To exert your influence to give to her piety a more elevated and healthy tone. And now that you are the hopeful heirs of an inheritance so glorious, and withal so near the heavenly goal, will not your benevolence prompt you to seek out and bring to Christ the aged impenitent sinner? They have a special claim to your sympathy. And who can feel for them like you, who have been their companions, who are subject to like afflictions, and who must soon meet them at the judgment seat? Though the efforts of others may have been ineffectual, through the divine blessing you may be successful.—How delightful would it be in entering your rest to go directly from the field of successful labor, attended by the souls of your fellows saved by the blessing of God on your instrumentality! And will you not labor and pray that the young may be bro't into the militant kingdom of Christ, to fill your places when you shall have joined the Church Triumphant?

PUBLIC OFFICERS.

"The duty of Christians to pray for them."

In a time like the present, when the whole community with very few exceptions is laboring under pecuniary embarrassments, and the "general pulse" of business standing still, it may be well to spend a thought on the prevailing propensity of insubordination to the laws, and to complain of public men and their measures. In a government like ours, it is expected that the policy pursued by the public servants should be scrutinized and freely and fully discussed; yet every citizen should remember, that as Government is an institution of Heaven, so deference to the "powers that be" is a Christian duty. Prayer for those in authority is not only enjoined by the scriptures, but is the most effectual method of obviating defects, where they may actually exist. Law-makers will not treat public opinion with contempt, when that opinion is under a divine influence. The hearts of rulers and kings are in the hands of the Lord, and he can turn them "whithersoever he will." A virtuous and pious nation, will be likely to have wise legislators, and sound administrators of the laws. The church has the assurance that God will make her "officers peace, and her exactors righteousness;" but such blessings must be sought and prayed for by her, or they will not be realized. The important influence exerted on even heathen rulers in behalf of individuals and nations by the prayers of Daniel, Esther, Samuel and others, while it illustrates the potency of the prayer of faith, affords the strongest inducement to Christians to comply with the Apostolic injunction, to pray "for all in authority" that our government and laws may be well administered, and that we may lead quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty. As this is a subject of vital importance to the community and nation, we propose to spread before our readers in our next, a discourse on "the duty of praying for our Rulers."

We publish to-day the correspondence between Mr. Fox, the British Minister, and Mr. Secretary Forsyth, in reference to the disputed territory. Its interesting nature, notwithstanding its length, will fully repay an attentive perusal. The subject is said to have produced much sensation in the Senate, and "elicited strong expressions", from several gentlemen; among whom were Mr. Webster, Mr. Davis, his colleague, and Mr. Williams, of Maine.—The purport of their remarks was, that the matter had now assumed a form that would admit of no longer delay. "That the claim of the United States must be enforced or abandoned." There are no apprehensions of a war with Great Britain.

REVIVAL RECORD.

The following cheering account of the commencement of a revival of religion in Genesee, Allegany Co. N. Y.; is from an esteemed brother who labors in the gospel in that place, to one of the publishers. We hope to hear in due time, more about the good work which has begun there, and that many souls have been made the happy subjects of redeeming mercy.

Dear Brother Greene—I devote a few moments with much pleasure in giving you intelligence that the Lord is manifestly by his spirit, working in the hearts of the people in this place. Our Quarterly-meeting commenced last sixth day, and the Lord was pleased to grant us his presence; and with the assistance of brethren Z. Campbell and J. L. Scott, the meeting has been continued for a number of days. A number of deathless spirits have been born into the kingdom of our blessed Lord. Many are apparently under deep convictions for sin. The church generally revived to a sense of their sins, their neglect of privileges, and to the obligations resting upon them as the people of the Lord. I would be more particular had I leisure.

Extensive revivals of religion are now experienced in Cincinnati, among the different denominations. Sixty persons were admitted into the third Presbyterian Church in that city in one day, a short time since. The interest still exists, and more are expected to unite soon. A work resulting in about the same number of conversions, has been in progress in the Sixth Presbyterian Church. Considerable interest is also manifest in the second (Dr. Beecher's) Church. An accession of about one hundred members has been made to the ninth street Baptist Church (Rev. S. W. Lynds.) Methodist churches of the city have received on probation, nearly FOURTEEN HUNDRED members, within a short time past.

Forty nine members have lately been received into the Presbyterian Church at Sharon, Ohio. The Church at Reading is also enjoying a revival. At Troy and Piqua, and other places in Ohio there are revivals in progress.

The churches in Philadelphia, Allentown, Germantown, Carlisle and other places adjacent are receiving very large accessions to their fellowship.

INTELLIGENCE.

THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.

The following Message, and the accompanying Documents, were on Thursday last transmitted to the Senate by the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate, herewith, copies of official notes which have passed between the Secretary of State and the British Minister, since my last message on the subject of the resolutions of the 17th of January.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, March 26, 1840.

From Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

Washington, March 13, 1840.

The undersigned, Her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, has been instructed by his Government to make the following communication to the Secretary of State of the United States, in reference to the boundary negotiation and the affairs of the disputed territory.

Her Majesty's Government have had under their consideration the official note addressed to the undersigned by the Secretary of State of the United States, on the 24th of last December, in reply to a note from the undersigned of the 2d of November preceding, in which the undersigned protested in the name of his Government, against the extensive system of aggression pursued by the people of the State of Maine within the disputed territory to the prejudice of the rights of Great Britain, and in manifest violation of the provisional agreements entered into between the authorities of the two countries at the beginning of last year.

Her Majesty's Government have also had their attention directed to the public message transmitted by the Governor of Maine to the Legislature of the State, on the 3d of January of the present year.

Upon a consideration of the statements contained in these two official documents, her Majesty's Government regret to find that the principal acts of encroachment which were denounced and complained of on the part of Great Britain, so far from being either disproved, or discontinued, or satisfactorily explained by the authorities of the State of Maine, are, on the contrary persisted in, and publicly avowed.

Her Majesty's Government have consequently instructed the undersigned once more formally to protest against those acts of encroachment and aggression.

Her Majesty's Government claim and expect from the good faith of the Government of the United States, that the people of Maine shall replace themselves in the situation in which they stood before the agreements of last year were signed—that they shall therefore retire from the valley of the St. John, and confine themselves to the valley of the Aroostook; that they shall occupy that valley in a temporary manner only, for the purpose, as agreed upon, of preventing depredations; and that they shall not construct fortifications, nor make roads, or permanent settlements.

Until this be done by the People of the State of Maine, and so long as that people shall persist in the present system of aggression, her Majesty's Government will feel it their duty to make such military arrangements as may be required for the protection of her Majesty's rights. And her Majesty's Government deem it right to declare that if the result of the unjustifiable proceedings of the State of Maine should be collision between her Majesty's troops and the people of that State, the responsibility of all the consequences that may ensue therefrom, be they what they may, will rest with the people and the Government of the United States.

The undersigned has been instructed to add to this communication, that her Majesty's Government are only waiting for the detailed report of the British commissioners recently employed to survey the disputed territory, which report it was believed, would be completed and delivered to her Majesty's Government at the end of the present month, in order to transmit to the Government of the United States a reply to their last proposal upon the subject of the boundary negotiation.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to the Secretary of State of the United States, the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

H. S. FOX.

Hon. John Forsyth, &c.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

Department of State,
Washington, March 25, 1840.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, acknowledges to have received Mr. Fox's communication of the 13th instant, in reference to the boundary negotiation and the affairs of the disputed territory. The information given in the closing part of it, that a reply to the last proposition of the United States upon the subject of the boundary may be expected in a short time, is highly gratifying to the President, who has however given directions to the undersigned in making this acknowledgement, to accompany it with the expression of his profound regret that Mr. Fox's note is in no other respect satisfactory.

After the arrangements which, in the beginning of last year, were entered into on the part of the two Governments with regard to the occupation of the disputed territory, the President had indulged the hope that the causes of irritation which had grown out of this branch of the subject could have been removed. Relying on the disposition of Maine to co-operate with the Federal Government in all that could lead to a pacific adjustment of the principal question, the President felt confident that his determination to maintain order and peace on the border would be fully carried out.

He looked upon all apprehensions of designs by the people of Maine to take possession of the territory, as without adequate foundation; deeming it improbable that on the eve of an amicable adjustment of the question, any portion of the American people would, without cause and without object, jeopard the success of the negotiation and endanger the peace of the country. A troublesome, irritating, and comparatively unimportant, because subordinate, subject, being thus disposed of, the President hoped that the parties would be left free at once to discuss and finally adjust the principal question. In this he has been disappointed. While the proceedings of her Majesty's Government at home, have been attended with unlooked for delays, its attention has been diverted from the subject of controversy by repeated complaints, imputing to a portion of the people of the United States designs to violate the engagements of their Government; which have never been entertained, and which Mr. Fox knows would receive no countenance from this government.

It is to be regretted that at this late hour so much misapprehension still exists on the side of the British Government, as to the object and obvious meaning of the existing arrangements respecting the disputed territory. The ill success which appears to have attended the efforts made by the undersigned to convey, through Mr. Fox to her Majesty's Government, more correct impressions respecting them, calls for a recurrence to the subject, and a brief review of the correspondence which has grown out of it, may tend to remove the erroneous views which prevail, as to the manner in which the terms of the arrangements referred to have been observed.

As Mr. Fox had no authority to make any agreement respecting the exercise of jurisdiction over the disputed territory, that between him and the undersigned of the 27th of February, 1839, had for its object some provisional arrangement for the restoration and preservation of peace in the Territory. To accomplish this object, it provided that her Majesty's officers should not seek to expel, by military force, the armed party which had been sent by Maine into the district bordering on the Restook river; and that on the other hand the Government of Maine would voluntarily, and without needless delay, withdraw beyond the bounds of the disputed territory any armed force then within them. Besides this, the arrangement had other objects—the dispersion of notorious trespassers, and the protection of public property from depredation. In case future necessity should arise from this, the operation was to be conducted by concert, jointly or separately, according to agreement between the Government of Maine and New Brunswick.

In this last mentioned respect, the agreement looked to some further arrangement between Maine and New Brunswick.—Through the agency of Gen. Scott, one was agreed to, on the 23d and 25th of March following, by which Sir John Harvey bound himself not to seek, without renewed instructions to that effect from his Government, to take military possession of the Territory, or to repel from it by military force the armed civil posse, or the troops of Maine. On the part of Maine, it was agreed by her Governor that no attempt should be made without renewed instructions from the Legislature, to disturb by arms the province of New Brunswick in possession of the Madawaska settlements, or interrupt the usual communications between that and the Upper Provinces.

As to possession and jurisdiction, they were to remain unchanged, each party holding in fact, possession of the disputed territory, but each denying the right of the other to do so. With that understanding, Maine was, without unnecessary delay, to withdraw her military force, leaving only under a land agent, a small civil posse, armed or unarmed, to protect the timber recently cut, and to prevent further depredations.

In the complaints of infractions of the agreements of the State of Maine, addressed to the undersigned, Mr. Fox has assumed two positions, which are not authorized by the terms of those agreements: 1st, admitting the right of Maine to maintain a civil posse in the disputed territory for the purposes stated in the agreement, he does so with the restriction that the action of the posse was to be confined within certain limits; and 2nd, by making the advance of the Maine posse into the valley of the Upper St. John, the ground of his complaint of encroachment upon the Madawaska settlement beyond those occupied at the date of the agreement.

The United States cannot acquiesce in either of these positions.

In the first place, nothing is found in the agreement subscribed to by Gov. Fairfield and Sir John Harvey, defining any limits in the disputed territory within which the operations of the civil posse of Maine were to be circumscribed. The task of preserving the timber recently cut, and of preventing further depredations within the disputed territory, was assigned to the State of Maine after her military force should have been withdrawn from it; and it was to be accomplished by a civil posse, armed or unarmed, which was to continue in the territory, and to operate in every part where its agency might be required to protect the timber already cut, and prevent further depredations, without any limitation whatever, or any restrictions, except such as might be construed into an attempt to disturb by arms the Province of New Brunswick in her possession of the Madawaska settlement, or interrupt the usual communication between the Provinces. It is thus in the exercise of a legitimate right, and the conscientious discharge of an obligation imposed upon her by a solemn compact, that the State of Maine has done those acts which have given rise to complaints for which no adequate cause is perceived. The undersigned feels confident that when those acts shall have been considered by her Majesty's Government at home, as explained in his note to Mr. Fox, of the 24th of December last, and in connection with the foregoing remarks, they will no longer be viewed as calculated to excite the apprehensions of her Majesty's Government that the faith of existing arrangements is to be broken on the part of the United States.

With regard to the second position assumed by Mr. Fox, that the advance of the Maine posse along the valley of the Restook to the mouth of Fish River, and into the valley of the St. John, is at variance with the terms and spirit of the agreements—the undersigned must observe that if at variance with any of their provisions, it could only be with those which secure her Majesty's Province of New Brunswick against any attempt to disturb the possession of the Madawaska settlement, and to interrupt the usual communications between New Brunswick and the Upper Provinces. The agreement could only have reference to the Madawaska settlements as confined within their actual limits at the time it was subscribed.

The undersigned, in his note of the 24th of December last, stated his reasons why the mouth of Fish River and the portion of the valley of the St. John through which it passes, could in no proper sense be considered as embraced in the Madawaska settlements. Were the United States to admit the pretension set up on the part of Great Britain, to give to the Madawaska settlements a degree of constructive extension that might, at this time, suit the purposes of her Majesty's colonial authorities, those settlements might soon be made, with like justice to any portion of the disputed territory; and the right given to the Province of New Brunswick to occupy them temporarily and for a special purpose might, by inference quite as plausible, give the jurisdiction exercised by her Majesty's authorities an extent which would render the present state of the question, so long as it could be maintained, equivalent to a decision on the merits of the whole controversy in favor of Great Britain.

If the small settlement at Madawaska on the North side of the St. John; means the whole valley of that river—if a boom across the Fish River, and a station of a small posse on the south side of the St. Johns at the mouth of Fish river is a disturbance of that settlement, which is twenty five miles below, within the meaning of the agreement, it is difficult to conceive that there are any limitations to the pretensions of her Majesty's Government under it, or how the State of Maine could exercise the preventative power with regard to trespassers, which was on her part, the great object of the temporary agreement. The movements of British troops, lately witnessed in the disputed territory, and the erection of military works for their protection and accommodation, of which authentic information recently received at the Department of State, has been communicated to Mr. Fox, impart a still graver aspect to the matter immediately under consideration. The fact of those military operations, established beyond a doubt, left unexplained or unsatisfactorily accounted for by Mr. Fox's note of the 7th instant, continues an abiding cause of complaint on the part of the United States against her Majesty's colonial agents, as inconsistent with arrangements whose main object was to divest a question, already sufficiently perplexed and complicated, from such embarrassments as those with which the proceedings of the British authorities cannot fail to surround it.

If, as Mr. Fox must admit, the objects of the late agreement were the removal of all military force and the preservation of the property from further spoilations, leaving the possession and jurisdiction as they stood before the State of Maine found itself compelled to act against the trespassers, the President cannot but consider that the American local authorities strongly and most favorably contrast with that of the colonial authorities of her Majesty's Government. While the one promptly withdrawing its military force, has confined itself to the use of the small posse, armed as agreed upon, and has done no act not necessary to the accomplishment of the conventional objects, every measure taken or indicated by the other party, is essentially military in its character, and can be justified only by a well formed apprehension that hostilities must ensue.

With such feelings and convictions, the President could not see, without painful surprise the attempt of Mr. Fox, under instructions from his Government, to give to the existing state of things a character not warranted by the friendly disposition of the United States or the conduct of the authorities and the people of Maine—much more is he surprised to find it alleged as a ground for strengthening a military force and preparing for a hostile collision with the unarmed citizens of a friendly State, pursuing within their own borders, their peaceful occupations, or exerting themselves, in compliance with their agreements, to protect the property in dispute from unauthorized spoilation.

The President wishes that he could dispel the fear that these dark forebodings can be realized. Unless her Majesty's Government shall forthwith arrest all military interference in the question—unless it shall apply to the subject more determined efforts than have hitherto been made to bring the dispute to a certain, a pacific adjustment, the misfortunes predicted by Mr. Fox in the name of his Government, may most unfortunately happen. But no apprehension of the consequences alluded to by Mr. Fox can be permitted to divert the Government and the people of the United States from the performance of their duty to the State of Maine. That duty is as simple as it is imperative. The construction which is given by her to the treaty of 1783 has been, again and again, and in the most solemn manner, asserted also by the Federal Government and must be maintained, unless Maine freely consents to a new boundary, or unless that construction of the treaty is found to be erroneous by the decision of a disinteresed and independent tribunal selected by the parties for its final adjustment.—The President, on assuming the duties of his station, avowed his determination, all other means of negociation failing, to submit a proposition to the Government of Great Britain to refer the decision of the question once more to a third party.

In all subsequent steps which have been taken upon the subject by his direction, he has been actuated by the same spirit. Neither his disposition in the matter, nor his opinion as to the propriety of that course, has undergone any change. Should the fulfillment of his wishes be defeated, either by an unwillingness on the part of her Majesty's Government to meet the offer of the United States in the spirit in which it is made, or from adverse circumstances of any description, the President will in any event, derive great satisfaction from the consciousness that no effort on his part has been spared to bring the question to an amicable conclusion, and that there has been nothing in the conduct either of the Government and people of the United States, or of the State of Maine, to justify the employment of her Majesty's forces as indicated by Mr. Fox's letter. The President cannot, under such circumstances, apprehend that the responsibility for any consequences which may unhappily ensue, will, by the just judgment of an impartial world, be imputed to the United States.

JOHN FORSYTH.

To the Hon. H. S. Fox, &c.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, March 26, 1840.

The undersigned, her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, has had the honor to receive the official note of yesterday's date, addressed to him by Mr. Forsyth, Secretary of State of the United States, in reply to a note dated the 13th instant, wherein the undersigned, in conformity with instructions received from his Government, had anew formally protested against the acts of encroachment and aggressions which are still persisted in by armed bands in the employment of the State of Maine within certain portions of the disputed territory.

It will be the duty of the undersigned immediately to transmit Mr. Forsyth's note to her Majesty's Government in England; and until the statements and propositions which it contains shall have received the due consideration of her Majesty's Government, the undersigned will not deem it right to add any further reply thereto, excepting to refer to, and to repeat, as he now formally and distinctly does, the several declarations which it has from time to time been his duty to make to the Government of the United States with reference to the existing posture of affairs in the disputed territory and to record his opinion, that an inflexible adherence to the resolutions that have been announced by her Majesty's Government, for the defence of her Majesty's rights, pending the negotiation of the boundary question, offers to her Majesty's Government the only means of protecting those rights from being in a continually aggravated manner encroached upon and violated.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to the Secretary of State of the United States the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

SUMMARY.

Another Fire at New Orleans.—The N. Y. Spectator of the 30th ultimo says: "On the night of the 13th inst. a Fire broke out in the store of Messrs. Felt & Co., Stationers, New Orleans. Before any assistance could be rendered, the fire had invaded the whole building, and communicated to the adjacent houses with such rapidity, that the whole range of four story buildings from the store of Messrs. Foote & Barrier to the corner of Custom House street, presented a complete mass of ruins." The loss is said to exceed $200,000. The whole buildings and goods were insured.—Doubts are entertained respecting the ability of the Insurance Companies to meet their engagements. The roof of one house was broken in by the falling walls, and several persons considerably wounded or burned. The goods in several stores were much damaged.

A DISGRACEFUL RIOT occurred at a political meeting at Masonic Hall, New York, on the evening of the 29th ultimo. Much damage was done to the building by tearing away benches and bannisters, and converting them into weapons. The Spectator says, "the rioters were forced into the street by the crowd above at the expense of a good many broken heads." Subsequently some fifteen or twenty persons who had remained in the room, where the meeting had been held, were assaulted by sixty or seventy of the rioters, who commenced beating them, knocking down, and trampling on them. The appearance of a strong posse of watchmen put an end to the disturbances in a few minutes, and the attendants of the meeting were permitted to pass into the street without further molestation.

The first Swedish vessel of war which has entered the port of New York for several years, is the Nejaden, which arrived on the 29th March from Laguira.

The bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and continue in circulation, Treasury notes to the amount of Five Millions of Dollars, has passed the House of Representatives.

The bill "To prevent illegal voting in the city of New York," which provides for the previous registry of the names of all legal voters, has passed both branches of the Legislature and become a law.

LATE AND IMPORTANT FROM TEXAS.

A new Republic organized!—Advices at New Orleans from Galveston to March 7, say that two companies of volunteers were to be raised at Houston for the frontiers. The remains of Mr. Eldredge, editor of the Houston Star, were buried with military honors by the Milan guards. Several keel boats are running between San Jacinto and Houston.

The Mexican forces are at Monteray, and have not crossed the Rio Grande, but fear the Texians will. The Texas treasury issues no more promissory notes, new wharves stores, &c. are going up at Galveston. A line of four horse coaches runs from thence to Velasco. Mr. McIntosh is appointed Charge to France; E. P. Waldon, Secretary of Legation. The Picayune adds some more authentic items: The Federal army after an unsuccessful attack on Monteray, retired to Guerrero and Laredo on the Rio Grande, where they organized a new government for the Republic of Rio Grande, and installed a General Council. Jesus de Cardenas, a lawyer of Tamaulipas, is President, and Canales, chief of the army.

"The new government is calling for volunteer aid, and expects to receive it from Texas and the United States; it is said that it will be more liberal with the quantum of bounty land than any other government ever was. The property of the Church and Convents, including their large landed estates, will be appropriated for the pay and the bounty of the volunteers.

A party of Camanches, about five hundred in number, invaded Mexico, destroyed and pillaged in every quarter, and fell upon 200 of Aristas troops and killed every one. The Lipan and Towakanoe are depredating on travellers and traders in small parties near Ponsales, San Antonio, &c.

Mexico.—The New Orleans papers bring late and interesting intelligence from Mexico—how the Federalists, abandoning in despair their attempts to overthrow the existing central government, have established a new and separate republic including some of the Northern provinces, which they have called the "Republic of Rio Grande;" how they have organized, by the appointment of a President and other officers of state—and how sundry Mexicans of distinction have joined them. Particulars, for which we have not room to-day, in our next.

Fortunate Escape.—On Thursday morning, the 5th inst., wl e crossing the bridge over Venable's dan near Barren Creek Springs, Somerset county, Marland, Mr. James K. Lewis and his wife, of this county, were precipitated down an awful precipice of 18 or 20 feet, into the bogs of the mill dam, from the horse taking fright at the noise produced by the starting of the mill. The carriage was dashed to pieces, and the horse badly wounded, and wonderful to tell, neither Mr. nor Mrs. Lewis were injured.—Cambridge (Md.) Chronicle.

SHOCKING MURDER.—About six weeks since a man was murdered on the Atchatulaya River, by three brothers, notorious desperadoes and the terror of the neighborhood. They were arrested, carried to Opelouses and imprisoned. A few days after their imprisonment they broke jail and escaped.—They returned to the house of the man whom they had killed, where they found his wife and two daughters, whom they compelled to live with them in their hiding places.

The circumstance created a very great excitement amongst the planters in the neighborhood, a number of whom, with the assistance of some Indians, went in pursuit of the murderers. Their retreat was soon discovered, when one of them, the most desperate of the gang, was shot through the head with a rifle ball and killed. The other two were again taken to Opelousas and imprisoned. A few days ago, owing to the carelessness or wilful neglect on the part of the jailor, the door of the prison was left unlocked, and the wretches again escaped.

We give the particulars as we have received them from a gentleman direct from Opelousas.—N. O. Picayune.

DIED,

In this town, on the 31st ultimo, W. S. CARPENTER, aged 44.

In this town, on the 2d inst., RUTH MAINE, aged 45.

Also, the same day, RACHEL, wife of Jarvis M. Rider, aged 23.

In Truxton, on the 30th ultimo, IRA WARNER, in the 53d year of his age, by a concussion of the brain which was caused by a kick received from his horse while leading him by the halter, which sprang from him turned and kicked, hitting him on the right side of his head over and in front of the right ear, fracturing the alveolar process of the right lower jaw. He lived 9 days after the injury, retaining his senses the most of the time. Mr. Warner was one of our early settlers—he was a good practical farmer, having by his industrious habits acquired an independent property. Mrs. Warner died 2 years ago, since which time Mr. W. and his children have lived alone, carrying on their demestic affairs in good harmony and love, up to the hour of the fatal accident that was to end his mortal life, and deprive a numerous family of a kind and affectionate father, and the neighborhood and community of a kind neighbor and good citizen—teaching all the importance of being also ready, for you know not what shall be on the morrow.—COMM.

In Brookfield, March 23d, in the 34th year of her age, MRS. ELIZA S. consort of Welcome Babcock. Her sickness was characterized by a perfect resignation to the Divine will, and her death by a triumphant exit from the shores of mortality. Mrs. Babcock was a faithful wife, an affectionate friend, a kind neighbor, and a useful member of the church. She professed religion in early life, and for a number of years previous to her death she was a worthy member of the 2nd S. D. B. Church of Brookfield. "The memory of the just is blessed."—COMM.

In Genesee, on the 28th of Dec. last, in the 30th year of her age, MARGARET, consort of Dea. Dennis Saunders, and daughter of Charles Saunders of Berlin N. Y. She became a member of the S. D. B. Church in Berlin about 17 years ago, and during her christian life, she in her walk fully evinced the power of religion in purifying the soul, and assimilating it to the divine nature of the great head of the church. As might be expected from such a life while in health, sickness did but bring her nearer unto God, and brighten her evidences and give her that unshaken confidence, that she could welcome the approach of death as the signal of her entrance into the kingdom of glory. In life she was a bright example of one adorned with the graces of the spirit; in death of triumph over the terrors of the grave. By her request her funeral discourse was preached from the text—"Be ye also ready."

Farewell! Farewell! thou cherish'd one,
For whom the bosom bleeds in vain,
And cannot heal its wounds, nor shun
Its aching throbs of silent pain.

To mourn thy fate and bless thy name,
Is all that now remains for thee,
While living none could coldly blame,
And dying left no faults to see. COMM.

In Genesee, Feb. 11th, Miss SARAH F. POTTER, aged 22 years, daughter of Benjamin Potter of Westerly R. I. She united herself to the S. D. Baptist Church in Hopkinton, nearly seven years ago, & has since maintained a faithful christian walk. In the latter part of life she was much afflicted with disease in the body, but her mind was strong, even in death. For more than a year previous to her death she had ceased to indulge hopes of recovery, yet she patiently waited the appearing of the messenger of death, to carry her spirit home to God. While she calmly watched the progress of disease, and the wasting of her frame, she maintained an even composure of feeling, and could say after the most severe pangs just before her death, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil."—Ps. xxiii. 4; from which at her request her funeral discourse was preached. COMM.

POETRY.

THE FAREWELL TO THE DEAD.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

Come near!—ere yet the dust
Soil the bright paleness of the settled brow,
Look on your brother and embrace him now
In still and solemn trust!
Come near! once more let kindred lips be press'd
On his cold cheek, then bear him to his rest.

Look yet on this young face!
What shall the beauty from amongst us gone,
Leave of its image, e'en where most it shone,
Gladdening its hearth and race?
Dim grows the semblance, on man's thought press'd!
Come near, and bear the beautiful to rest!

Ye weep, and it is well!
For tears befit earth's partings!—Yesterday
Song was upon the lips of this pale clay,
And sunshine seem'd to dwell
Where'er he moved—the welcome and the bless'd!
—Now gaze! and bear the silent to his rest.

Look yet on him whose eye
Meets yours no more, in sadness or in mirth!
Was he not fair amongst the sons of earth,
The beings born to die?
But not where Death has power, may Love be bless'd
—Come near! and bear ye the belov'd to rest.

How may the mother's heart
Dwell on her son, and dare to hope again!
The spring's rich promise hath been given in vain,
The lovely must depart!
Is he not gone, our brightest and our best?
—Come near! and bear the early-called to rest!

Look on him! is he laid
To slumber from the harvest or the chase?
Too still and sad the smile upon his face,
Yet that, e'en that must fade!
Death will not hold unchanged his fairest guest
Come near! and bear the mortal to his rest!

His voice of mirth hath ceased
Amidst the vineyards; there is left no place
For him whose dust receives your last embrace,
At the gay bridal feast!
Earth must take earth to moulder on her breast,
Come near! weep o'er him! bear him to his rest.

Yet mourn ye not as they
Whose spirit's light is quench'd—For him the past
Is seald. He may not fall' he may not cast
His birthright's hope away!
All is not here of our beloved and blest!
—Leave ye the sleeper with his God to rest.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NAVAL POSITION OF ENGLAND.

Blackwood's Magazine.—Let not nations imagine, from all that has been said or may be said by the Conservatives on this vital subject, that Great Britain has now lost her means of defence or that, if a serious injury or insult is offered to her, she may not soon be brought into a condition to take a fearful vengeance upon her enemies. The same page of history, which tells us that while democratic states never can be brought to foresee remote dangers, or incur present burdens to guard against it, when the danger is present, and strikes the senses of the multitude, they are capable of the most stupendous exertions. That England, in the event of a war breaking out in her present supine, unprepared state, would sustain in the outset very great disasters, is clear; but it is not by any ordinary calamities that a power of such slow growth and present magnitude as England is to be subdued. She now possesses 2,800,000 tonnage, and numbers 1,600,900 seamen in her commercial navy, and a fleet of seven hundred steamboats, more than all Europe possesses, daily prowl along her shores. Here are all the elements of a powerful marine; at no period did Great Britain possess such a foundation for naval strength within her bosom. What is wanting, is not the elements of an irresistible naval force, but the sagacity in the people to foresee the approaching necessity for its establishment, and the virtue in the government to propose the burdens indispensible for its restoration. In the experienced difficulty of either communicating this foresight to the one, or imparting this virtue to the other may be traced the well-known and often predicted effects of democratic ascendency. But that same ascendency, if the spirit of the people is roused by experienced disgrace, or their interests affected by present calamity, would infallibly make the most incredible exertions; and a navy, greater than any which ever issued from the British harbours, might sally forth from our sea girt isle, to carry, like the French revolutionary armies, devastation and ruin into all the naval establishments of Europe. No such career of naval conquest, however, is either needed for the glory, or suited for the interests of England; and it is as much from a desire to avert that ultimate forcible and most painful conversation of all the national energies to warlike objects, as to prevent the immediate calamities which it would occasion, that we earnestly press upon the country the immediate adoption, at any cost of that great increase to our naval and military establishments which can alone avert one or both of these calamities.

A clergyman was once accosted by a doctor, a professed deist, who asked him if he followed preaching to save souls. "Yes." "Did you ever see a soul?" "No." "Did you ever taste a soul?" "No." "Did you ever smell a soul?" "No." "Did you ever feel a soul? "Yes." "Well," said the doctor, "there are four of the senses against one, upon the question whether there is a soul?" The clergyman then asked, "if he were a doctor of medicine?" "Yes." "Did you ever taste a pain?" "No." "Did you ever see a pain?" "No." "Did you ever smell a pain?" "No." "Did you ever feel a pain?" "Yes." "Well then," said the clergyman, "there are also four senses against one upon the question whether there be a pain; and yet, sir, you know that there is a pain, and I know that there is a soul."

COMMUNICATIVE NATURE OF CHRISTIANITY.

It is interesting to look not only at the communicative nature of Christianity with respect to the diffusion of knowledge, but to the probable permanency of its influences, compared with that of ancient kingdoms.—Take Egypt for an example. The wisdom of the Egyptians was proverbial, yet how little has the world profited by them. They were once the people, and their wisdom died with them. The world, instead of being taught by them, sends her wise men to spell out what they thought and said, from their hieroglyphs. Concerning the knowledge which these emblems were intended to impart, "Destruction and Death say, we have had the same thereof with our ears." We think of Chompollion in a mausoleum, lying on his back, far up under the roof, sketching the mystic signs. So passes the mysteries of this world which knew not God. Will any nation which receives and retains Christianity ever become a desert, and its places of sepultured grandeur echo to the foot-fall of the solitary and adventurous traveler, searching what, or what manner of time, the indentures of its caves and ruins indicate? We believe it to be impossible. Besides, increasing intercourse will keep the various portions of the world from stagnation and decay, as the currents and tides of ocean do its own ports. Those who assist in diffusing Christianity, we believe, are doing an imperishable work.

DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

From the bosom of poverty and obscurity, in which I drew my first breath and spent my earliest years, I have raised myself to a state of opulence, and to some degree of celebrity in the world. A constant good fortune has attended me through every period of my life to my present advanced age, and my descendants may be desirous of learning what were the means of which I made use, and which, thanks to the assisting hand of Providence, have proved so eminently successful.

And here let me with all humility acknowledge, that to Divine Providence I am indebted for the felicity I have hitherto enjoyed. It is that power alone which has furnished me with the means I have employed and which has crowned me with success. My faith in this respect leads me to hope, though I cannot count upon it, that the Divine goodness will still be exercised towards me, either by prolonging the duration of happiness to the close of life, or by giving me fortitude to support any melancholy reverse which may happen to me as to so many others. My future fortune is known but to Him in whose hand is our destiny, and who can make our very afflictions subservient to our benefit.

The young reader would do well to pay attention to the history of a man, who, by his industry, perseverance, and economy, arrived to riches and honor. He is the first American philosopher. It is true that every man is not borne with a genius like Franklin, but every man may and ought to be honest and industrious in his station.—Life of Franklin.

APHORISMS.

To acquire a habit of forgiving crimes, is too often the same as making advances towards them ourselves. It is necessary to the security of virtue that we should abhor vice.

It is pleasant to be virtuous and good, because that is to excel many others; it is pleasant to grow better, because that is to excel ourselves; it is pleasant to mortify and subdue our irregular wishes because that is victory; it is pleasant to command our passions and keep them within the bounds of reason and religion, because that is Empire.

Speak not well of yourself, nor ill of others. Speak of people's virtues, conceal their infirmities:—if you can say no good, say no ill of them.

To render good for evil is god-like; to render good for good man-like; to render evil for evil is beast-like; to render evil for good is—devil-like.

If thy soul be not adorned with modesty, prudence, and solid goodness, all thy external accomplishments will be nothing but mere pageantry.

INTEMPERANCE AND FRUGALITY.

He that hankers after dainties, must often feel displeased; and sometimes lie at the mercy of a dear market.

In eating, we must remember we have two guests to entertain, body and soul; let us then never so overload the former, as to starve, sink, and ruin the latter.

Wine and strong drink have drowned more than the sea; and the teeth of intemperance slain more than the sword.

He that accustoms himself to buy superfluities, must ere long sell his necessaries.

The prodigal robs his heir; the solid miser robs himself; the middle way between both, is justice both to ourselves and others.

What maintains one vice, would bring up two children.

Nature is satisfied with little; grace with less; but lust, with nothing.

Wilful waste makes woeful want.

An intemperate patient makes a cruel doctor.

There is not in the whole range of poetry, ancient or modern, a more wonderful truth, or a truth more wonderfully expressed, than the following, from the 'Psalm of Life, by Professor Longfellow—

"Art is long, and time is fleeting,
And our hearts, though stout and brave,
Still, like muffled drums are beating,
Funeral marches to the grave."

Generally speaking, those that have the most grace and the greatest gifts, and are of the greatest usefulness, are the most humble, and think most meanly of themselves. So those boughs and branches of trees which are the most richly laden with fruit, bend downward, and hang the lowest.

Reading not Knowledge.—It may be questioned whether the reading even of what are called good books may not be carried too far; whether it may not hinder reflection, promote self-ignorance, flatter with the name of a good work, and terminate in mere profession and spiritual pride. All the books in the world will not let us into the knowledge of our hearts, unless we take them there ourselves by meditation. The very innocence of the employment renders a man too careless of what should be going on within. He is like a person who, having a large acquaintance with men of agreeable manners, wide information, and good character, spends all his time among them, without looking to his domestic concerns. And the consequence is likely to be the same—a home in disorder and confusion. Let those companions be the most pious of men, the result will not be otherwise; and let the student's occupation be sacred literature itself, he will not escape the evil effects of too exclusively outward attention, unless he is careful, by frequent meditation, to apply the results of his studies to practical improvement.—Evan's Biography of the Early Church.

Whitefield's Eloquence.—An officer in Glasgow who had heard Mr. Whitefield preach, laid a wager with another, that at a certain charity sermon, though he went with prejudice, he would be compelled to give something. The other, to make sure, laid all the money out of his pockets; but before he left the church, he was glad to borrow some and lose his bet. On another occasion, Mr. Whitefield preached in behalf of the inhabitants of an obscure village in Germany, which had been burnt down, and collected for them six hundred pounds. After the sermon, Whitefield said—"We will sing a hymn during which, those who do not choose to give their mite on this awful occasion may sneak off." No one stirred; he got down fom the pulpit, and ordered all the doors to be shut but one at which he held the plate himself, and collected the above sum.—Countess of Huntington's Life and Times.

The union of extremes.—"Sir Isaac Newton," says Spence, "a little before he died, said, 'I don't know what I may seem to the world, but as to myself I seem to have been only like a boy playing on the sea shore, and diverting myself in now and then finding a smoother pebble or a prettier shell than ordinary, while the great ocean of truth lay all undiscovered before me.'"

FOR THE CHILDREN.

AIM HIGH.

We are little skilled in nautical affairs, having had scarce any connection with them since the joyous days of our happy child-hood, when we floated our miniature vessels, rigged out in all their nameless paraphernalia of sails, and jibs, and flags upon the broad and placid bosom of the bright Susquehanna, nevertheless, we think that we have somewhere read that the great success which attended the navy of our country during our last war with the mightiest nation on earth, was mainly attributable to the strict adherence of our officers and men to the motto which we have placed as a caption of this article—that by aiming high they raked the decks of their enemy's vessels, riddled the sails and rigging,—shattering the masts and spars, won the victory, and carried home the uninjured bulk to be remasted and re-rigged, and sent forward to do battle in our country's service. What a motto of great import!—and if it was the harbinger of victory to the armies of the republic, in the dark days of danger, why may it not be attended with success if we apply it to the moral world and the every-day transactions of life when danger is far off, and peace with gentle wing broods smilingly o'er us. Surely there is nothing to prevent it; we could scarcely hit upon a motto better suited for the young and ardent mind just about to launch forward upon the vast and tumultuous ocean of Time! 'Aim high!' Whatever may be the situation in which it has pleased fortune to place you in life, no matter how humble or how lowly in the scale of existence it may be, nor how much the pride of upstart birth or wealth may endeavor to brow beat you, still in all of your transactions with your fellow men, in all your commerce with the world around you; make it your one great study to 'aim high'—to maintain the bearing of honor and probity so that neither the wealthy vain, nor the foolishly wise, may have occasion at any time to curl the lip of scorn either at your appearance or at your calling. But above all in the companionships which it may be necessary for you to form in life, be careful to keep a single eye to that one great and important object: 'Aim high'—endeavor to form your associations among those above you; not above you in rank or birth or wealth, though these need be no impediment, but rather an advantage if coupled with the other requisites, but in mind, talent, and the influence which these qualifications will never exercise over meaner objects. As to friendships, intimate friendships—that communion of heart with heart which should never be profaned by a smile at weakness, or outraged by even a thought of divulging it; let them be few, for few are there who can bear to unwrap themselves from the contemplation of the frown of private griefs, and bestow a passing thought upon the gloomy catalogue of woes that may fall to the lot of their fellow mortals to endure. But a few there are, happily for the honor of humanity, of those high and noble souls not entirely given up to the full and sole enjoyment of self and selfish pursuits, who can turn aside and shed a tear of pity over your misfortunes, point out to you the hidden rock on which you might have foundered, and, like the finger post of Time, direct you on the proper current, and teach your fragile bark to shun those dangers which await to buffet it in its course. But if they are few they also are almost inaccessible. They have studied too intimately into the ways and vanities, the deceptions and the treachery of the world to stoop from the high pinnacle upon which nature ever indulgent to her children has placed them, to be caught by the mere clap trap of empty professions. 'Aim high' then, therefore, if you wish to win the confidence and fellowship of those of nobility of mind which we as the inheritors of freedom dare or should claim, for they stand upon high places, and works, not 'the mere breath of words,' will win them to your bidding. There is a certain pride of self-love to be observed, better expressed by the French double epithet, as Coleridge would have called it, amour propre which exercised in a manner consistent with a sphere in which you move, and with that high aim in view which we have endeavored to embody in this article, cannot fail to render the young scuffler with fortune in the end a victor. Then while we use our best energies in the attainment of that 'high aim,' let us also resort to the plain and simple life of Franklin:—which is known to us all—all recollect that great man was once but a Journeyman Printer.—Columbia Spy.

FOR THE FARMER.

A RULE WORTHY OF THE FARMER'S ATTENTION.

A most important axiom to be kept in mind by every farmer is, to break up and cultivate no arable land to be laid down again with depreciated strength: in other words, no crop requiring the plough or cultivator and hoe should be put into the ground the present year which will leave the ground in a worse condition than it was before the work was begun. It will, when adopted as a principle, be very easy for every farmer to make his calculation in any crop requiring the hoe, so to improve the capacity of his land that it shall yield more than it has done before. A plenty of good barnyard, hog-yard, stable, or compost manure will effectually do this business on almost every retentive soil: in some cases of low and wet grounds, the simple application of sand or gravel with a small quantity of the stimulating manures, will accomplish every thing to be wished: in other cases of sandy porous soil, the application of clay or other adhesive earths, with the free use of plaster of Paris, and some stimulating manures will do wonders. The observance of the principle of constant renovation will soon bring New England to rank with the best cultivated districts of England and Scotland, and even the still higher improvements exhibited in Flemish husbandry.—Gov. Hill's Address.

Value of Salt.—An increased quantity of salt used by the farmer in various ways would be of eminent benefit. Salt ought to bear a less price than it now does throughout the country. Much of the expense of salt is in the price of transport; it is a taxed article, and assists in the revenues of the government. I am confident that fine salt sprinkled over the ground in the quantity of three or four bushels to the acre, will not only contribute to drive off insects and other destructive vermin, but in most vegetable crops will prevent blight. A sprinkling of salt in the feed of most animals will contribute to their healthy growth.—Ibid.

ADVANTAGES OF LABOR.

The life of every man is filled up with a mixture of good and evil. No one is perfectly happy; no one is entirely wretched. For wise purposes it is ordained that all shall taste in some manner both the bitter and the sweet. The necessity of labor which has been imposed upon nearly all mankind, is too often considered an evil. It is not so. We are never more mistaken than when we desire to be relieved from it, or when we look upon it as a source of misery. If we would select one man who is more wretched than another, let us take him who has nothing to do but to seek his own pleasure. We shall soon find that time hangs heavy on his hands; that every thing which the world calls pleasure is insipid to him, and that his life is burdensome. He has never accomplished any thing that he can look back upon with satisfaction, and he becomes displeased with himself and all the world beside. It is not so with the laboring man. While he submits to toil he sees its results with keen gratification; he looks with a kind of exultation upon the productions of his skill and the workmanship of his own hands; he alone can enjoy whatever of real pleasure there may be in the possession of wealth, because he knows how it has been acquired, and has seen it gradually accumulating by his own efforts. In truth every thing noble and dignified in men springs from this stern necessity of laboring to sustain life. But for this our animal natures would wholly overcome the intellectual, and sink us to a level with brutes. It is the conflict with difficulty, the struggles to which we are daily driven, which quicken our genius, extend our knowledge, enlarge our minds, and call forth all our energies.

No where upon earth can we look for happiness and excellence, if not in some useful occupation. This great truth has been too much neglected, and almost forgotten during the period when men have been striving to get rich by every other means except productive labor. The consequences are now apparent in the misery and crimes with which many portions of our fair land are afflicted. But men will finally learn where their error has been, and we shall redeem ourselves by a voluntary and cheerful submission to all the wise and immutable laws of nature. We shall learn to love labor, if not for its own sake, for the rewards which it brings and the happiness which it bestows. And above all other miseries we shall desire to be delivered from that of idleness.—Sun.

THE NEW-YORKER.

THE publishers of the New-Yorker respectfully announce the commencement of a new volume of their journal on the 21st of September being the Eighth of the double Quarto Edition, and completing the Sixth year of its publication in the Folio or common newspaper form.

The New-Yorker is now so widely known as to render superfluous any detailed delineation of its character and objects. Suffice it here that the work is intended to sustain the reputation of a Weekly Literary Journal not inferior in ability and standing to any on either side of the Atlantic. About two thirds of its columns are devoted to the best Original and Selected Literature, comprising Reviews, Essays (Scientific and Literary,) Tales, Poems, choice extracts from New Works, Biographical and Historical Sketches, &c. &c. In this department, Critical Notices of nearly all new publications of interest will be given. The remaining columns will be devoted to a condensed abstract of the Political and General Intelligence of the day, Domestic and Foreign. Under this head the returns of all important Elections throughout the United States will be carefully compiled and compared with those of former Elections, so as to give a clear exhibit of the relative strength of each political party in the several States. All political movements of interest will likewise be briefly and impartially chronicled. In fine, it will be the general aim of this paper to be first useful and instructive, then agreeable and entertaining. The steady support through the last three years of an average of more than 8,000 subscribers warrants the belief that the conduct of the work has not disappointed the hopes of its friends, while it has secured the decided approval of an intelligent public. Such as it has been it will continue to be, with the additional aid already secured in its Editorial department, to which it is hoped that still further strength will be added by arrangements now in progress. If unwearied exertion and a fixed resolve to spare no labor or expense which may tend to elevate the character of their work can avail any thing, the undersigned are justified in cherishing a confidence that their journal will at any rate maintain the standing it has already attained in the public estimation.

H. GREELEY & CO.

THE LARGEST NEWSPAPER IN NEW-YORK.

TERMS—Three Dollars per annum, or two copies for Five Dollars.

The publishers of THE EMPIRE STATE, having completed their arrangements for the Enlarged Series of that paper, will issue on Thursday, January 9th, the first number of the largest Newspaper ever published in New York. Having procured new materials wherewith to execute the printing in a style of elegance unsurpassed by any other newspaper—and having also secured such aid in the several departments, local and general, literary and political, of the paper, as to ensure its worth as a valuable FAMILY NEWSPAPER, the publishers offer it with entire confidence to the patronage of an enlightened public, and a full reliance upon their taste and discrimination for support.

We have chosen the title of "The Empire State," as expressive not only of our attachment to the interests of New York, but of the Union; for whatever interests New York, in a great degree, interests the Union—whether in prosperity or in adversity.—And, as the Empire City is the great centre of business and commerce of the country—the point also where Intelligence from the European World is first received, and from which it radiates throughout the Union; so is New York, in many respects, if not in all, the most eligible point for the establishment of a valuable National Newspaper, as the medium through which shall be diffused to the States and Territories of the Republic, the earliest Intelligence, general and political, from every part of the world,

* * * * * *

The mammoth size of our paper enabling us to present weekly an amount of matter contained in no other paper—we shall labor to present such a variety, original and selected, as will suit the tastes of all classes. The Politician, the Moralist, the Farmer, the Mechanic, the Merchant, and Professional Man, the Student and the Antiquary, the lover of humor, and such as would unfold a "Map of the Busy World,"—each and all may find amusement and instruction in the ample pages of the Empire State.

Some prominent features will be given to the paper, not found in any other. The utmost pains will be taken to present, at the earliest date, all important intelligence from every State in the Union—to collect and preserve Statistics and Important Facts, civil, political, and miscellaneous—to give full accounts of the proceedings of Congress, and of the Legislatures of the States—the best Speeches of distinguished American Orators and Statesmen—Memoirs of Eminent Men—Original Tales, Essays, and Poetry—Collections in the History and Antiquities of the Country—Improvements in Agriculture, and the Arts—Gems from the Current Literature of the Day—Notices of all New Works worthy of commendation—and Occurrences at Home and Abroad, commercial, monetary, or of whatever nature that can be of interest to the mass of readers throughout the country.

More, perhaps, we need not say—but submit our labors to the candid judgment of the public.

TERMS OF THE EMPIRE STATE.

THE DUTY OF PRAYING FOR OUR RULERS

I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men; for kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty.—I TIM. ii: 1, 2.

Those who pray for the world are its greatest benefactors. The text speaks forth the benevolence of the gospel; it requires us to pray for the whole human family, for those of every grade and condition. It particularly specifies, as the subjects of our prayers, those who are in authority.—The early christians paid strict attention to this duty: they prayed for all officers of government, whether Pagan, Arian, or Christian. Approbation of what is iniquitous in the private or public character of rulers, or any commitment in favor of any unjust and oppressive official measures, is not implied by obedience to this inspired exhortation; for at the time in which it was penned, Nero himself was "in authority."

Here, also, it may be the proper place to observe, that we should never seize upon the occasion of supplicating for men in official stations, to avail ourselves of the opportunity of censuring their characters, or reprehending their measures; any expressions having this appearance, should be carefully avoided. To pray for rulers in such a manner as to intentionally excite emotions of party strife and prejudice in the minds of those who are expected to join with us, would be highly injurious, and exceedingly wicked; and to produce such undesirable results through carelessness of expression, is also sinful.

As families, and as members of different religious societies, and as citizens of this community, we are convened in accordance with the promptings of our own hearts, and in compliance with the Proclamation which has been read, to offer public thanksgiving unto God for blessings bestowed upon us as individuals, and in our domestic and public relations. Several states of the union join with us in this delightful exercise. On such an occasion, it is appropriate to bestow some thought on the subject which has been introduced, viz:—

THE DUTY OF PRAYING FOR OUR RULERS.

1. GOD COMMANDS US TO PRAY FOR THEM. The exhortation which is given in the text is of universal application, and it came from the pen of an apostle, who was "moved by the Holy" Ghost to write it. God, the hearer of prayer, the God of all nations, and the Ruler of all rulers, requires us to come before Him with our supplications in behalf of all who are in authority.

2. WE SHOULD BE INCITED TO THIS DUTY BY OUR REGARD FOR THE INDIVIDUAL NECESSITIES OF THE SOULS OF OUR RULERS.

If they are pious they are placed in circumstances trying to their piety. They are in danger of being flattered by the world, or perplexed by the cares of government, to their great injury in personal religion. The more exalted any station of secular trust is, which any professor of religion is called to fill, the greater is his danger that his official honors and duties will prove detrimental to the best interests of his soul. We all wish to avoid every injurious influence upon our property, person, or mental faculties, but injury to the soul is, more to be deprecated, inasmuch as the realities of Eternity outweigh all that can be mentioned as belonging merely to this life. A lover of the Savior would rather choose to be attached for life to the most menial employment, if thereby his piety could be rendered safe and prosperous, than to be called to fill the most honorable station in civil government, to the injury of his growth in grace.

The temptations and dangers now surrounding the few pious men in this nation who are now in authority, are not few nor small. Such men should often be remembered in our prayers. We should pray, not only that they may be kept from retrograding in vital piety, but that their possession of honors, as men in authority, may conduce to their future and everlasting preferment as "kings and priests unto God."

But those occuping elevated stations in government who are not christians, how great is their danger! They stand in most imminent exposure of sinking to everlasting ruin. Their minds are so occupied with public affairs, that they will not bestow much time to the interest of their souls. They are beset with ten thousand exciting influences, some corroding, some pleasing, some superlatively fascinating, and all combined to jeopardize the salvation of their souls. They are not usually under the regular public instructions of faithful ministers, like men in private life; or if a few are thus favorably situated, fewer still enjoy the benefits of close personal instruction and exhortation at the fire-side. Ministers of the gospel are too apt to neglect to deal plainly with such men face to face. If this kind of effort is sometimes attempted by some embassador of Jesus, it need not surprise us to find that he is met with a haughty repulse. Where are the private christians who labor personally, with faithfulness, perseverance, and systematic effort, for the salvation of impenitent men in high official stations? Are such men seen in the neighborhood conference meeting, where the gushing sympathies of the christian community gather around the wandering sinner? Are they found at home with their families, when pious men go from house to house to pray, and to plead with their neighbors to be "reconciled to God"? Do men of this class, crowded as they are with public business, and scarcely finding time to peruse the governmental reports which they aided to form; and excited as their minds are with warm debates, and perplexed in investigating the financial affairs of the nation—do they secure time to set down and read a tract of four pages on "The Way to be Saved"? Are they seen with the Bible in their hands? What religious influence directly reaches them?—You say, the Holy Spirit can reach them. True; but the influences of which we have spoken form the medium through which He chooses to operate. Does the Spirit bring to their minds instructions which they may have received in former days; the words of a pastor, the example of a pious sister, the admonitions of a father, the tears and entreaties of a godly mother—all, all, may be in a moment repelled by simply merging the mind in some all-absorbing political theme. This they will be inclined to do, and Satan will hasten them to do it. But in some way you say, the Holy Spirit can effectually reach them. Yes, encouraging truth! And in view of this truth, and of the critical condition of the souls of these men, in view of their awful exposure to the deepest hell, I urge you to pray for them. Such men cannot be saved, because they are men of mighty minds, and of extensive influence, and of great utility to the public. If they go to heaven, they must enter those holy abodes as other men do, simply by faith in the atoning blood of the Lord Jesus Christ. They must see themselves ruined by sin—must feel that God would be just to send them to perdition; saying from the heart,

> "And if my soul were sent to hell,
> Thy righteous law approves it well."

From their lips must come the entreaty,

> "Yet save a trembling sinner, Lord," while, with child-like simplicity, they must resolve,

> "Here, Lord, I give myself away,
> 'Tis all that I can do."

We trust that our beloved WASHINGTON is in heaven; but he is not there because he was the father of his country. His distinguished character as a patriot and a statesman, constituted no part of the reason why he was admitted to a seat in the realms of bliss. If his voice mingles with the voices of saints above, it is because he trusted in Jesus, the Lamb of God. My christian friends! the souls of the impenitent men who are now in authority in our country, are in great danger of being forever banished from the presence of God, and of being shut up with "spirits in prison." O pray for their salvation! I press this upon you, not because their souls are worth more than the souls of other men, but because they are worth as much, and are in special hazard of being lost. The good Mr. Baxter used to say, "A soul is worth too much to be lost for want of labor"; and let not, I beseech you, the soul of any one who is now in authority in this nation be lost for want of your prayers.

We shall see the importance of praying for our rulers, if we consider,

3. THEIR INFLUENCE UPON THE MORAL CHARACTER OF THE PEOPLE.

If men in authority are Sabbath-breakers, and licentious men, and intemperate men, and gamblers, and Duellists, it will be difficult to make the young men of America to feel that these vices are disgraceful. It is the fear of disgrace that saves thousands of youth from being engulphed in the vortex of vice. If men in exalted stations are vicious, the disgraceful character of vice in the view of many aspiring youth, will be almost obliterated. Every immoral action of a man in authority, strengthens headstrong youth to resist the restraints of parents, and to set at defiance all law, human and divine. When Cataline wished to subvert the Roman government, he began by corrupting the youth. The evil example of men of talents and high official station, will corrupt youth more rapidly than the most pernicious infidel books and publications. But the example of pious men in authority, is of more value to this nation than words can express. Thanks must be given to God for the few of this description whose names we might now mention; and earnest prayers and supplications should be offered for those of an opposite character, that they may be turned to righteousness.

We ought to pray for our rulers,

4. BECAUSE THERE IS NEED OF THE DIVINE BLESSING ON THEIR BEST CONCERTED PLANS.

No plans for the good of the nation can succeed unless God add his blessing. "Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." It may be thought that this country has been saved of late from war, on two emergencies, by the adroit and prudent management of some peace-making statesmen. Without wishing to detract in the least from the credit due to such men, I will say, that we should have been plunged into the midst of war, had not God, in answer to the prayers of his people, given success to men in authority who labored for the preservation of peace. Do our thoughts now fasten upon objects which we most ardently desire to see accomplished? Let us pray God to give our rulers wisdom, and to bless their consultations for the removal of national evils.

We shall be induced to pray for our rulers, if we consider,

5. THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF THEIR STATION.

They are placed in the first rank of influence for sustaining civil government. Civil government is an ordinance of God.—Unless it is sustained, the foundations of society will be broken up. If there be government, there must be men in authority to sustain its several departments. Upon the action of such men much depends respecting the support of government itself. But farther: our rulers are the representatives of the best system of government on earth; and they are now in authority in a most critical time for the administration of that government. The responsibilities that crowd around them are immense. We shall more deeply feel this sentiment, if we notice what important subjects are about to be brought before the Legislatures of the several states, and our national Legislature, by the petitions of the people. Through the voice of the people, Temperance, Chastity, and Liberty, will plead for Legislative aid. Before the Legislature of our own state, petitions from all classes of citizens will pray, that every line which is adverse to the cause of human rights, may be immediately repealed from the statute book of the state of New-York: also that a law may be enacted, giving, in the fullest sense, any human being claimed as a fugitive slave —a trial by jury.

Whatever difference of opinion may exist among thinking men, respecting the course which our legislators ought to pursue relative to these important subjects, no one can fail to see that we ought to pray that they may fully realize the vast responsibilities which are thus thrown upon them, and that they may meet them in such a manner as shall best promote the permanent and highest interests of our common country, and secure the approbation and blessing of God.

When the attention of our state and national Legislatures is called to the necessary and intricate work of adjusting our financial affairs, and to the no less arduous task of sustaining and perfecting our superior system of internal improvements, we justly feel that great objects are before them,—that great responsibilities devolve upon them. But these matters are but as the drop in the bucket, but as a feather in the balance, when compared with the moral interests which we have named as demanding legislative attention. For whatever disposal may ultimately be made of those questions which involve our secular concerns, and monetary institutions, unless the legislative action of the states and of Congress, according to the appropriate sphere of each, speak forth in unequivocal tones in defence of Liberty,—the doom of the United States is sealed, and the nations of the earth will soon be called to walk in the funeral procession of a country, which had proclaimed herself among them—"the cradle of Liberty!"

By the imperativeness and benevolence of a prayer-hearing God; by the worth of the immortal souls of our rulers, (joined with the special danger that those souls will be lost;) by the need of the Divine blessing on their best concerted plans; by the power of their influence, for good or for evil, on the moral character of the people; by the responsibilities of their station, exhibited by their position as God's appointed supporters of civil government, and by the great moral interests that gather around their halls of legislation—I exhort you, first of all, when you come before God with giving of thanks, intercessions, supplications and prayers—REMEMBER THOSE IN OUR NATION WHO ARE NOW IN AUTHORITY.

RELIGIOUS.

From the Sunday School Journal.

MR. WILBEFORCE.

This distinguished man was born in 1759. Upon the death of his father he was removed, at the age of eight years, to the family of his uncle, who was a pious member of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. His mother had paid no attention to his religious principles, but in his new connection, his attention was constantly drawn to religious subjects. When he reached his twelfth year, he was in habits of devotion, and had become acquainted with the Bible. "Under these influences," he said, "my mind was interested by religious subjects. How far these impressions were genuine I can hardly determine, but at least I may venture to say that I was sincere."

When his mother perceived this change of character she was much alarmed, (chiefly because the uncle and aunt were of a different religious persuasion from her own,) and brought him home, and endeavored by gaiety and indulgence to dissipate his seriousness. "The religious impression which I gained at Wimbledon continued for a considerable time after my return from Hull, but my friends spared no pains to stifle them. I might almost say, that no pious parent ever labored more to impress a beloved child with sentiments of piety, than they did to give me a taste for the world and its diversions."

"The strength of principle they had to overcome was indeed remarkable. When first taken to a play, it was almost, he says, by force. At length, however they succeeded; and the allurements of worldly pleasure led his youth away from all serious thoughts. At home there was nothing but gayety and amusement; at school there was little diligence or restraint."

He entered college at the age of seventeen—fell there into licentious company, and continued there in a course of pleasure for which his income supplied him with abundant means.

Of his twenty-sixth year his record is—"Often while in the full enjoyment of all that this world could bestow, my conscience told me that in the true sense of the word I was not a Christian. I laughed, I sang, I was apparently gay and happy, but the thought would steal across me,—"What madness is all this: to continue easy in a state in which a sudden call out of the world would consign me to everlasting misery, and that, when eternal happiness is within my grasp."

Soon afterwards he experienced an entire change of character, and his life of decided piety commenced. We subjoin some of the notices of his parental conduct, contained in his biography, which was compiled by two of his sons, both of whom are clergymen.

"One main purpose of his summer retirement, was, to watch the tempers and dispositions of his children."

"During the session [of parliament] he was so busy, and so much from home, that he could see little of them through the week, but Sunday was his own, and he spent it in the midst of his family. His children after meeting him at prayers, went with him to the house of God; repeating to him in the carriage, hymns or verses, or passages from his favorite Cowper. Then they walked with him in the garden, and each had the valued privilege of bringing him a Sunday nosegay, for which the flowers of their little gardens had been hoarded all the week. They all dined together, at an early hour, in the midst of cheerful, yet suitable conversation. "Better," was one of his Sunday common-places, "says the wise man, is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith; but, my children, how good is God to us! He gives us the stalled ox and love too."—Never was religion seen in a more engaging form than in his Sunday intercourse with them. A festival air of holy and rational happiness dwelt continually around him."

One of his principles was—

"It is of great importance to preserve boy's affections, and prevent their thinking home a dull place."

At the age of sixty-four, Wilberforce said of some incident, "It brought to my mind some lines which I wrote in my copy book at eight years old. I have never thought of them since." He then quotes them at length. This is a fact worth remembering by those who have the storing of the memories of children.

PRAYER.

Prayer is the great channel through which all the blessings, received from the bountiful hand of our Father in Heaven, are conveyed. What a dreary waste would this world present, if there was no communion with the bright world of glory by prayer; if the soul was not permitted to lift itself above this earthly ball, upon which we tarry for a season. We may petition to an earthly court, and our petitions be slighted by our fellow men: but when we petition to the court of heaven, we are sure of being heard. There is no blessing which we can ask, that would be for our good to receive, and for the honor of God's cause to bestow, that He will deny us, "if we ask in faith, nothing doubting." Do clouds of darkness arise, and eclipse our sun for a season? let us repair to the throne of grace and there wrestle with God until he dispel the gloomy mists, and bid his radiant glory shine into our souls. Do afflictions fall to our lot in this life, and we feel that God is visiting us with his rod? let us not sink beneath it, but let us lift our hearts to heaven, and there tell all our anguish, and seek for resignation to the divine mind by prayer. Does Satan by lying words tempt our feet to stray from the path of holiness, by tasting a little of the pleasure of this world, and join in its vain amusements? Let us look to God for aid and ask wisdom of him "who was tempted in all points like as we are, but without sin, and his promise is sure that we shall not ask in vain. Does "iniquity abound and the love of many wax cold?" let us plead with God day and night, until he come; remembering that "the effectual fervent prayer of the righteous man availeth much;" not merely the desire of the heart, but the expression of that desire, in language strong and fervent. But is prayer for the christian alone? Ah! no. If christians need to pray, and ask pardon of their Father in Heaven, surely the sinner who is at enmity with God has need of prayer. And happily for such, the throne of grace was erected equally free for all: the vilest sinner who has not grieved the Holy Spirit quite away, may come and find access to this throne, if he will turn from his wicked way, and seek God with his whole soul.—But there is a time coming when it will be too late to pray. When the Savior shall have turned Judge, and shall have exchanged the mediatorial for the judgement seat, then sinner it will be too late to cry for mercy, at the hand of an offended God: and "if the righteous are scarcely saved where shall the sinner and the ungodly appear?"

My knees shall be made acquainted with bowing, consequently my lips shall be filled with praises, and my heart with love. O Love! the sweetest and noblest of all sensations; some of thy blessed emanations, we are permitted to feel and enjoy even in this wretched world. Here we have a chequered scene; joy succeeds sorrow, and sorrow succeeds delight. But arrived at that blessed haven, in the bosom of heavenly love, we will forget all disagreeables; joys upon joys, bliss upon bliss, will roll in succession through all the ransomed powers of our existence; in that happy world, for ever enjoy the excellences of that holy religion, of which we have only some glimmering views and faint experiences in this life. Oh! may the cords of divine love sweetly draw my heart, and the hearts of all my beloved brethren, united particularly in a covenant to love and pray for each other, until our happy spirits are lost and swallowed up in their only true centre.

GOD'S PATIENCE.—Let us imitate God's patience in our own to others. He is unlike God that is hurried with an unruly impetus to punish others for wronging him. The consideration of Divine patience should make us square ourselves according to that pattern. God hath exercised a long-suffering from the fall of Adam to this minute on innumerable subjects, and shall we be transported with desire of revenge upon a single injury? If God were not slow to wrath, a sinful world had been long ago torn up from the foundation. And if revenge should be exercised by all men against their enemies, what man should have been alive, since there is not a man without an enemy? If every man were like Saul, breathing out threatnings, the world would not only be an Aceldama, but a desert. How distant are they from the nature of God, who are in a flame upon every slight provocation from a sense of some feeble and imaginary honor, that must bloody their sword for a trifle, and write their revenge in wounds and death! When God hath his glory every day bespattered, yet he keeps his sword in his sheath: what a woe would it be to the world if he drew it upon every affront! This is to be like brutes, dogs, or tigers, that snarl, bite, and devour upon every slight occasion: but to be patient is to be Divine, and to show ourselves acquainted with the disposition of God. "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."—S. Charnock.

HEALTH PROMOTED BY GODLINESS.—Godliness doth very much conduce to health, which is so necessary to our enjoyment of any sensible good, that without it, neither riches, nor honors, nor any thing that we esteem most gratifying to our senses, will signify any thing at all to us. Now that a sound and healthful constitution does exceedingly much depends upon a discreet government and moderation of our appetites and passions, upon a sober and temperate use of all God's creatures which is an essential part of true religion, is a thing so evident, that I make no words about it.—What are most of our diseases and infirmities, that make us miserable and unpitied while we live, and cut us off in the midst of our days, and transmit weakness and rottenness to our posterity, but the effects of our excesses and debauches, our wantonesses and luxury? Certainly, if we would observe those measures in our diet, and in our labors, in our passions, and in our pleasures, which religion has bound us up to, we might to such a degree, preserve our bodies, as to render the greatest part of physic perfectly superfluous.—Sharp.

SELF-EXAMINATION.—He that never examines his own heart, is like a captain of a vessel who never examines his ship to see if there is a leak; and without reformation, all such will finally shipwreck their souls, and all will be lost. Alas! what multitudes, who once shone as burning lights, have perished for lack of self-examination. Reader! art thou secure?

CHRISTIAN CONVERSATION.—Those who have tasted of the goodness of God are frequently wanting in declaring it. They do not, as they ought, stir up the gift of God, which is in every believer, by exciting one another to continual thankfulness, and provoking each other to love and good works. We should never be content to make a drawn battle, to part neither better nor worse than when we met. Christian conversation is to precious a talent to be thus squandered away.—Wesley.

FOR THE IMPENITENT.

RELIGION IN A DYING HOUR.

It is in a dying hour that the real value of religion is felt. There are other seasons in which religion may be highly prized, and at all times its possessor places it far above every earthly treasure. In adversity it comes in to console and to cheer, in prosperity it moderates and admonishes, becomes a visitor in sickness, a guide in health, in youth an ornament of grace and beauty, in manhood a crown of glory, a staff and support in declining age. In the bustle of business, in the storm of debate, in the discharge of stern and painful duties it is the mind's calm anchor ground; it sweetens bodily toil, makes even weariness a rest, beguiles the leisure, solitary hour, and fills it with joys unknown to sense and indescribable to an earthly mind.

Yet there are considerations which gather around a dying hour of peculiar and awful meaning. Men think they can enjoy life without religion, and though every day mocked and disappointed, they think so still. True, they can preserve existence, and this is too often made synonomous with enjoying life. Let these miscalled enjoyments, however, be reckoned at their utmost price. The interests of religion do not require them to be undervalued. The pleasures peculiar to a sensitive nature may be, and naturally will be highly prized by him who knows no other. Active business too, diverts the thoughts from real sufferings and sorrows. Thus men may manage to pass through life with some degree of calmness and satisfaction, without religion, because they know not its value. Not so at the hour of death. Every earthly tie is now to be sundered, all former sources of enjoyment to be cut off, all accumulated stores to be scattered; on what shall the soul rely?

In that hour what is wealth? Let it be in the form of lands, of houses, of bank stock, or of shining metal, what can it do for the dying man? Can it ease his pain? Can it heal his wasting body? Can it bring peace to his troubled spirit? Array it before that death-stricken form, balance his cash-book, show him that ten thousand, twenty thousand, fifty thousand, stand him good; bring out the little trunk, unlock and count over the rolls of bank bills, or pour out the shining, yellow pieces, or bolster up his pale wasting form, carry him to the window, let him gaze to the extent of his feeble vision over his beautiful estate, and say to him, "behold your portion! rejoice in your work and be satisfied!" Ah! will you mock him thus?

Or bring up the gazette, on which his name stands conspicuous, remind him how a fortunate, well-timed deed of his, won for him lasting renown, how many shouted his name, how many applauded his eloquence, with what confidence thousands gave him their suffrage; and exhort him in view of this, to be happy in the hour of death! Tell him of his learning, of his extensive researches and vast accumulations of thought, of his deep insight into the mysteries of science, and urge him to make this his staff in the valley and shadow of death! Try to convince him how much he will be respected in the world to which he is going, for his uncommon acquisitions in this, urge him to hold up his head and march bravely on!

Ah! who would thus cruelly treat a dying man? Who endeavored to make him satisfied in death, with what could never fully satisfy him in life! What! send a man with money, with learning, with fame, to purchase an inheritance in a future, a spiritual world! Will such coin be current there? Ask the soul that stands on the border of that undiscovered world, to whom its realities begin dimly to appear.—Then if no one would taunt a dying man with these things, why should men taunt themselves, and why should we taunt each other with them now? If these things are vanity in the view of death, they are vain now; if religion be valuable then it is valuable now. In the full tide of life and health we should remember the events of a dying hour.—Chris. Watch.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

CONSCIENCE.

The foul heart maddens at her faithful voice,
She must be silenced, and for this be seared.

Strive not to silence thy Conscience.

The testimony which she bears against sin, is hateful to those that love it. The light which she flashes in upon the cherished but concealed treasury of evil deeds must be banished or the soul must give them up. The wicked love their sins, and therefore love the darkness; and therefore seek to annihilate the light. They are anxious to retain their sins, and yet maintain an unbroken quiet. This Conscience will not suffer; hence arises an habitual, artful, experienced, and oftentimes successful conflict with their solemn and stern Reprover.

They begin by alleging circumstances which they suppose may palliate their offences.

So did our first parents. "The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave unto me, and I did eat. The serpent beguiled me and I did eat. If it had not been for the woman—if it had not been for the serpent—if it had not been for the peculiar circumstances in which I was placed, I should not have done it." Is Conscience satisfied with this? No! but then,

They will promise future reformation.

"Let me once more repeat the crime.—Spare me yet a little longer, and then I will cease. I shall not descend into the darker vaults of guilt. I will not go down into the crater of sin's terrible volcano. I will only dance upon its quivering edge once more," says the drunkard. "I will restrain myself," says the temperate rum drinker. "I shall never become a thief, a defaulter, a robber," says the dishonest tradesman. "I shall never die impenitent," says the man who bids the gospel depart, until a more convenient season.

Sometimes they endeavor to disguise the sin, so that it may be introduced to the soul when Conscience does not see it.

So David contrived the death of Uriah, hoping that the guilt of murder would not be laid upon his soul. "Thou canst not say I did it," says the terrified Macbeth, "never shake thy gory locks at me." Lies, frauds, and all kinds of evil deeds are thus often admitted. Ah, vain subterfuge, Conscience is not to be effectually duped. The facts, the motives, the horrible consequences, will all gather round, each in their place, each true to the gigantic power of reproof—yet this gathering may be delayed awhile, until their number is complete. The heaven-sent Nathan will come however. The ghost of Banquo will rise.

Often, to silence Conscience, a compromise is attempted, and an exchange of sins is proposed.

The scenes of guilty pleasure are forsaken for the toils of avarice. The more open acts of profaneness, for the more secret indulgence of bad propensities. This depravity assumes various phases, while Conscience still lashes the offender through them all.

Men will even perform deeds of extraordinary goodness, in order to silence Conscience.

The man who has defrauded his neighbor of ten thousand, can afford to make a splendid charitable donation of one. The man who has gone to excess of riot, can afford a few acts of excessive penance. The man can afford to keep lent, who is to be rewarded with a carnival. The man who has spent life in fraud, may bequeath a noble legacy to science, to his native city, or to the church.

Men will divert their attention in order to shun the gaze of Conscience.

Is the sermon likely to be too close? it will be well to sleep. Perhaps you can find something in the assembly to interest your attention. It is very unmannerly to take out a book, or a newspaper, for the purpose of excluding a sermon; yet even this has been done, when Conscience has been very active, and truth very provoking. The woman of Samaria, when communing with the omniscient Savior at Jacob's well, was exceedingly adroit, and would have deceived and escaped from any but a prophet.

Frequently men will seek aid from each other.

Not feeling satisfied with themselves, and with some particular deed, they endeavor to gain the testimony of their friends to its correctness. In such cases they generally color the facts a little, and are dishonest with their neighbor as with their own Conscience. Good men, when thus consulted, should be very careful what answers they give.

When none of all these methods will succeed, they often attack the truth itself with sophistical reasonings.

Perhaps regeneration may not be essential: perhaps there is no eternal punishment—no future misery—no hell at all: perhaps there is no revelation—no truth in the Bible—no God. The mind is restless. The prophets of Baal are consulted. The wisdom of Baalam is employed. Different views of the same subject are tried. "Come curse me Israel, come defy me Jacob. Come look upon the camp of truth from another hill: perhaps thou canst curse it from thence." The frantic rebel, determined not to give up his sin, leaps from one platform of truth down to one below, rejecting all but the belief of a God. Conscience hovers over him even there. Her eye is full of fire; her sword gleams with lightning: her voice is thunder; and her attitude ineffable disdain. The wretch cannot endure the vision. He springs away from the last principle of truth; he launches amid the freedom and darkness of atheistical rebellion, and has full liberty to sin without control, to intoxicate his intellect with delusion, and debase his nature to brutality.

Those who cannot thus succeed, will finish the contest by plunging deeper in sin.

Making up their minds to perish, despairing of reformation, determined to run the risk of meeting the worst that can come, they give themselves over to the foulest ways of sin, and perish in the mad excitement of abandoned depravity. They hurry onward to their final ruin with such startling rapidity, that they give themselves no time to contend with Conscience. They drown her voice in the perpetual hurrah of their degradation.

Such are some of the methods which men employ to stifle in this life the voice of Conscience. They wound her: they defile her: they sear her lips with a burning iron: they become past feeling: they surrender themselves to all the varieties of intemperate depravity, and they succeed often in producing a seeming quiet. The Spirit of God, grieved, insulted and despised, forsakes the soul forever! The heart has gained a dreadful victory. Fiends of hell hold their jubilee in it. Good influences all hasten away. Ruinous elements of avenging retribution knock at the door.—There is an awful silence—a dead calm—such as proceeds the sirocco; such as announces the earthquake; such as with mute and colorless lips, heralds the fiery tornado.

THE POOR MAN'S DEATH-BED.

Tread softly!—bow the head—
In reverent silence bow!
No passing bell doth toll,
Yet an immortal soul
Is passing now.

Stranger! how great so'er,
With lowly reverence bow!
There's one in that poor shed,
One by that wretched bed,
Greater than thou.

Beneath the pauper's roof,
Lo! Death doth truss his state;
Enter—no crowds attend;
Enter—no guards defend
This palace-gate.

That pavement, damp and cold;
To whispering courtiers tread;
One silent woman stands,
Clasping with pale thin hands,
A dying head.

No busy murmurs sound—
An infant wail alone—
A sob suppressed—again
That short, deep gasp—and then
The parting groan.

O change! O wondrous change!
Burst are the prison bars!
This moment, there so low
In mortal pangs—and now
Beyond the stars!

O change! stupendous change!
There lies the senseless clod;
The soul from bondage breaks—
The new immortal wakes—
Wakes with his God.

GOD'S PRESENCE.

The thought that God is ever about us, makes this world a serious world, and should lead us ever to walk through it with serious steps. It should indeed increase our cheerfulness, and sweeten our enjoyments, to think that our Father is beside us! But it should also fill us with a holy jealousy of ourselves, and with anxious watchfulness against every thing, whether in spirit or conduct, which may be displeasing to Him. An ancient philosopher advised the magistrate, as a restraint to the wicked, to write at the corner of every street, "God sees thee, O sinner!" But to us who believe in the divine omnipresence, that inscription, "God sees thee," is not only in every street, but upon every object, above, around, within and beneath us.

If we would but open our hearts to the reception of this solemn and all-important truth every thing would proclaim it to us. Every thing would echo to us the presence of that God,

"Who gives its lustre to the insect's wing,
And wheels his throne upon the rolling worlds."

We might see it in our own existance and enjoyments—in the revolving year and the changing seasons. We might read it in the stars—the alphabet of heaven, in which he has stereotyped his own glory, and in the planets which are rolled by his hand through trackless space. We might hear it in the thunder's voice, and see it gleaming in the lightning's flash. Every insect would sing to our ears of the hand that sustains it.—Every breeze would murmur of his presence. Every leaf would whisper, "God is here!" And if the imaginary presence of some great and good man could restrain impropriety and prompt to nobleness of conduct on the part of a pagan, then surely the known presence of the heart-searching God, the greatest and best of all beings, should make us watchful of all our actions, should check the very first risings of folly and sin, should give purity to our motives, and humility to our hearts, and holiness to our lives; should lead us ever to live as under Jehovah's eye, in such a manner as to secure HIS approbation. T. E.

GOD IS LOVE.—God is love: all his perfections and procedures are but so many modifications of his love. What is his omnipotence but the arm of his love? What his omniscience but the medium through which he contemplates the objects of his love? What his wisdom but the scheme of his love? What are the offers of the gospel, but the invitations of his love?—What the threatnings of the law but the warnings of his love? They are the hoarse voice of his love, saying, "Man! do thyself no harm." They are a fence thrown round the pit of perdition, to prevent rash men from rushing into ruin. What was the incarnation of the Savior, but the richest illustration of his love? What were the miracles of Christ, but the condescension of his love? What were the sighs of Christ, but the breath of his love? What were the prayers of Christ, but the pleadings of his love? What were the tears of Christ, but the dew-drops of his love? What is this earth but the theatre for the display of his love? What is heaven, but the Alps of his mercy, from whose summits his blessings, flowing down in a thousand streams, descend to water and refresh his Church situated at its base?—Dr. Waugh.

ADAPTATION OF CHRISTIANITY.

When we look at Christianity in the New Testament we see a set of discoveries, promises and precepts adapted to influence the whole character: it presents an object of incessant solicitude, in the pursuit of which new efforts are to be exerted and new victories accomplished, in a continual course of well doing, till we reach the heavenly mansions. There is scarce a spring in the human frame and constitution it is not calculated to touch, nor any portion of human agency which is exempted from its control. Its resources are inexhaustible; and the considerations by which it challenges attention, embrace whatever is most awful or alluring in the whole range of possible existence. Instead of being allowed to repose on his past attainments, or to flatter himself with the hope of success without the exercise of diligence and watchfulness, the Christian is commanded to work out his salvation with fear and trembling. In the actual exhibition of religion, the solicitude of serious minds has been made to turn too much on a particular crisis, which has been presented in a manner so insulated, that nothing in the order of means seemed instrumental to its production. In short, things have been represented in such a manner as was too apt to produce despondency before conversion, and presumption after it.—Robt. Hall.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

For the Register.

DEAR BRETHREN—I take pleasure in correcting a mistake into which I was led relative to the London Society for promoting Christianity among the Jews. From some published remarks relative to that Society, I had concluded that it was doing but little or nothing in accomplishing the object for which it was organized, and I stated in one of my reports to the Executive Committee of our Heb. Miss. Board something to this effect. I am enabled to correct this mistake by being put in possession of a London monthly periodical, devoted to the interests of that Society. The number for June last contains the proceedings of its thirty-first annual meeting, held in May last, in the Episcopal Chapel in London.—Their meeting appears to have been large, and their speakers animated with the success which has attended their efforts both at home and abroad—and give encouraging accounts of the spirit of enquiry relative to the christian religion upon the continent of Europe, as well as in England. It appears that the receipts into the Treasury of the Society last year was 17,501£, 19*s*, 2*d*—about eight hundred thousand dollars,—and this sum is reported as less than their receipts the year before. The closing remarks of their interesting report, which I will copy, will give a summary of the fruits of their labor. W. B. MAXSON.

In closing their report, your Committee would recall your attention for a few moments to the consideration of the general results of your past labors under the blessing of Almighty God. To consider a particular mission in its immediate effect, may appear sometimes discouraging; but when we review the past, and survey the general results of the whole, it excites astonishment and thankfulness. Your Committee, therefore, venture to repeat some statements which have been previously made; but which will come before you with growing evidence of their truth and importance.

The increasing acquaintance with the word of God, the growing desire for the scriptures, which has urged influential Israelites recently to publish editions of their own, and widely-spreading knowledge of christian doctrine, and the animated discussions now carried on amongst this people, are becoming matter of general notoriety.

Numerous conversions also attest that the gospel is not preached nor the word of God distributed in vain. The Baptismal Register, of the Episcopal Jews' Chapel, contains a list of two hundred and twenty-nine individuals of the Jewish nation received into the Church of Christ by Baptism, 190 having been baptized in the chapel, and 70 previously to its having been opened for Divine service. Of the whole number, as you have already heard, 96 were baptized as adults, and the rest children. Besides these, many Israelites have been baptized in different parts of the kingdom of whom we have no accurate account. There are now, at least, eighty clergymen of the Church of England who are of the Hebrew nation, and twenty-three of the missionaries and agents of the Society are converts from Judaism. Doctor Tholuck, an eminent professor in the Prussian University of Halle, has stated with reference to the Continent, that it is an undoubted matter of fact, that more proselytes have been made during the last twenty years, than since the first ages of the Church. Not only in Germany, but also in Poland there has been the most astonishing success; and he bears testimony to what has come within his own observation in the capital of Silesia, his native place, where many conversions have taken place. In the University of Breslaw there are three professors who were formerly Israelites.—A professor of Philology, a professor of Chemistry, and a professor of Philosophy; there is, besides, a clergyman who professes the gospel, and he was a Jew. In Halle there are no less than five professors, formerly Jews; one of Medicine, one of Mathematics, one of Law, and two of Philosophy. Some of the Jewish conversions have taken place amongst men of the highest literary attainment; and, amongst others, he mentions Dr. Neander, of Berlin; Dr. Branis, of Breslaw; Dr. Stahl, of Erlangen. These are all persons of the highest scientific reputation, and are now faithful followers of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The city of Berlin is said to number upwards of 700 resident baptized Jews, many of whom are known to be truly converted, and the Rev. Mr. Kuntze alone, who has always taken such a lively interest in the cause of Israel, stated three years ago, that he had himself baptized eighty Jews. The Rev. W. Ayerst baptized 40 adults at Berlin in less than three years; and the Records of the Protestant Consistory attest that 326 were baptized in eight years.

It is well known that your missionaries are not usually called upon to baptize converts. This is the proper work of the local clergy, and in the authentic Registers preserved by them in some districts of the Continent, your Committee discern a striking evidence of the Divine blessing.—These are not, of course, acquainted with all the individuals referred to in these statements; but they lay before you the documentary evidence they contain, as of the most important and interesting nature.

The Royal Consistory of Silesia states that, from 1820 to 1834, no fewer than 347 individuals of the Jewish nation were baptized in the Protestant communion, and 108 in that of the Roman Catholics, making a total of 455 in fifteen years. In 1835, thirty Israelites were baptized, and 27 in 1836, of whom only three were baptized in the Romish communion. In 1837, the number of baptisms was forty-three.

A similar official statement from Konigsberg, gives a total of 234 baptisms in 24 years, of which 217 are in the Protestant Church, and 17 amongst the Roman Catholics. In 1836, thirty-nine were baptized, only one being in the Romish communion; and in 1837, there were twenty-two, all in the Protestant communion.

In the whole Prussian dominions 1838 Israelites were baptized in fifteen years.

The missionaries of Warsaw have furnished a list of 130 persons baptized by themselves.

Your Committee are expecting to receive official statements of this kind from several other places, and they ask, Is there not abundant evidence that a blessing rests on the work of the Society?

They are prepared to expect difficulties, but they desire to go forward in humble reliance upon Divine grace. They are urged on by every motive of gratitude, justice, and humanity—they are encouraged by the sure word of Prophecy,—"All Israel shall be saved," and they are sustained by the promise—"They shall prosper that love thee."

The following copy of a letter has been politely furnished me by the Rev. C. F. Frey, which, if published in the Register, may afford some satisfaction to your readers. It may be pleasing to know that the writer is a convert from Judaism of many years standing. W. B. M.

London, Feb. 6, 1840.

DEAR BROTHER FREY—I have received your letter, and it gives me much pleasure to know that you have safely arrived at the other side of the Atlantic. I also rejoice that you have commenced your exertions amongst our brethren of the house of Israel, and I hope that the American Christians are ready to help you, and I think it a privilege to do something for poor Israel, the ancient people of God.

We are, thank God, doing a great deal in England for the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And the missionary accounts from the continent, Jerusalem, and other places are delightful. But I must confess, as I have done before, that you have, under God's blessing, been the founder of it all. Therefore go on, and God our Savior will bless you: for he has promised that we shall reap if we faint not.

I remain, dear brother, yours sincerely,

A. SAUL.

THE WHEAT AND THE TARES.

What solemn and fearful responsiblities rest on the church of God! Under obligations the most imperative to maintain purity in the visible body of Christ, by cherishing the holy principles of his kingdom—by constant communion with him who is of "purer eyes than to look upon sin"—and by putting away the wicked from their fellowship! For the faithful discharge of these important trusts, Jehovah holds every visible branch of his Zion responsible: and every motive which can operate on minds whose supreme desire is to glorify God, is spread out before them to induce benevolent and concerted action. And yet, in full view of all the fearful retributions that are denounced against merely nominal professors, the church in its militant state has always been infested with false members who have tarnished its beauty, impeded its progress, injured its reputation, and disturbed its peace. In how many instances is it necessary to exercise forbearance towards those whose characters are doubtful at best, lest by their immediate excision a deeper wound should be inflicted on the cause of Christ by discouraging the weak in faith, than could be feared from their continued connection with the church while no outward immorality is chargeable upon them, or while there is any hope of their being reclaimed. It is not to be expected that all the members of any branch of the church should possess so deep an acquaintance with the discipline of the house of God, as not to be unfavorably affected by the speedy removal of some who are in reality destitute of any sympathy for the cause of Christ, or desire for its success, and therefore unworthy of a place amongst Christians.

But in following the directions of the Savior to "let both grow together till the harvest," the church is not absolved from the duty of making unremitting efforts to convert "the sinner from the error of his way," or of a prompt exercise of discipline, even to exclusion upon sufficient evidence of guilt, it is only enjoined to exercise forbearance until such developements of true character transpire, and to refer all to the decisions of the great day when a righteous disposition shall be made of both the wheat (or christians) and the tares, (or nominal professors.) What an important inquiry for every church member to make—Am I a tare? And will the present life of suspense be succeeded by a destruction the most awful and interminable? And may I not now seek for a spiritual renovation, and escape an end so dreadful as that of being bound up with the wicked and committed to flames that cannot be quenched? If a true lover of God, I shall, when my work on earth is done, be gathered into the heavenly garner, to enjoy in full and endless fruition the unspeakable bliss consequent upon a union with Christ, and seeing him as he is.

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES, in reference to the settlement of the important Boundary question now pending between our Government and Great Britain, are at present unfavorable. In a former number we expressed our belief that a war between the two countries was not to be seriously apprehended. We are of the same opinion still, notwithstanding the military preparations now being made along our frontier, and the fact that a force amounting to more than twenty thousand regular troops, besides a numerous corps of well-trained militia, is now in active service in the Canadas. As to the line described in the treaty of 1783, between Maine and New Brunswick, we think if the British ministry would divest themselves of diplomatic pride, and act with candor, there would be an immediate renunciation of their pretensions to any right of jurisdiction over any part of the territory now in dispute. But they are committed, and it might be embarrassing to them to yield, even were they conscious of their wrong. The British Government is said to be repairing their fortifications between their Provinces and the United States, as far up as Malden and Sandwich, opposite Detroit; and though the ostensible reason for these movements is to prevent the depredations of the Patriots, it is suspected by many that other objects are aimed at by the British authorities. Whatever may be their intentions, it is quite certain that no benefit can be expected from a war between Great Britain and the United States either in the acquisition of territory, or in point of national importance. We deprecate such an event,

1. Because the commercial interest of both countries would be greatly disparaged by it.

2. Because of the expensiveness of war, an immense amount of property would be wasted by it.

3. Because there are other objects to promote of the greatest moral and political consequence which are common to both nations; such as the improvement in navigation, and the ameliorating the condition of mankind generally by advancing the interests of religion and civilization.

4. We should regret to have a war on account of its demoralizing tendency.—Our nation has hardly recovered from the injuries of the late war in this respect, and every lover of morality and social order would exceedingly regret the occurrence of another at this time.

5. Besides the evils above mentioned, a war would be attended with a needless effusion of blood.

6. It would be calculated to check, if not destroy, the spirit of revivals in our country. During the last few months they have blest and cheered almost every portion of our beloved country. Many young men have been converted, to whom we have reason to expect the ministry of reconciliation will be committed, who will become burning and shining lights in the world; but who, in the event of a rupture, might be called to wield the weapons of a carnal warfare; and our youth, nay, our whole population, becoming intoxicated with the spirit and speculations necessarily attendant on such a state of things, the interests of religion must necessarily decline.

We hope there may be further forbearance on the part of our Government, and such a desire for an equitable adjustment of differences, that peace may be long continued, and the united energies of the two nations, so near to each other by blood, language and interest, may be engaged in pouring such a flood of light on the heathen world, as shall accelerate and usher in the blessed period when "the nations shall not learn war any more."

The Sermon on our first page was delivered by Rev. J. R. JOHNSON, of this village, on the day designated by our State Executive for prayer and Thanksgiving, at which time a large assembly, composed of a number of denominations, were in attendance. Having had the privilege of hearing the discourse, and considering the sentiment very important, and pertinently expressed, we solicited and obtained a copy for publication. And although some time has elapsed since its delivery, we are of opinion that this is no objection to its insertion, since the subject is of universal application. We hope our patrons will enjoy the same satisfaction in perusing, as we did in hearing it, and that all who read, may be induced cheerfully to comply with the duty enjoined.

☞WANTED IMMEDIATELY☜

At this office, a thorough, enterprising and responsible man to travel as agent for this paper. To such a person, good encouragement will be given if application be made soon. Satisfactory recommendations will be required.

To X. Y. Z.

Calling at the Printing Office a few days since, I was presented with a letter professing to be a solution of the problem which appeared in the third number of the Register, bearing my signature. I profess that I was very much pleased that one was willing to try his skill upon the little question. And I must say that if the gentleman had not misapprehended the nature of the question, I think he would have presented us with the answer.

Observe! the earth is not to be dug out, but formed into a hollow globe, which must contain every particle of the earth.

Very respectfully yours,

G. M. L.

The solution presented last week by X. Y. Z., from a very cursory examination, appeared to us to be correct, and as our limits would not allow of its publication last week, we concluded to insert it in our next. But it now appears that both our correspondent and ourselves were mistaken relative to the question—we will wait another week for X. Y. Z. to furnish a solution, which we have no doubt he will be able and willing to do.

REVIVAL RECORD.

For the Register.

REVIVAL IN CASTILE.

I learn by a communication from a friend in Castile, that there is a glorious work of grace in progress in the east part of that town, [Gardeau Flats,] and that a great number of the hitherto most violent opposers have been brought to see their truly alarming condition, and have embraced the Savior. Oh, may that "lone valley" be made to "blossom as the rose." H.

De Ruyter, April 10, 1840.

We extract the following items of revival intelligence from the Morning Star:

IN CARLISLE, PA.—There is a glorious revival. Many of the students in Dickinson college are among the subjects. One hundred have joined the church, and 50 more have obtained hopes.

Camden, N. J.—103 converts. Revival still in progress.

Troy, N. Y.—114 added to one of the Methodist churches, and the work is equally powerful in the other.

Perry, N. Y.—100 profess conversion, 40 of whom are heads of families. One entire neighbourhood, except three or four cases, within the sweep of a mile radius, have been converted. The converts are aged, middle aged, and youth.

One of the means most successful in this work was visiting from house to house—talking plainly and pointedly on the subject of religion with all, both saint and sinner.

Saratoga Springs, N. Y.—50 have professed to find peace with God within a week. The work is going on.

Belvidere circuit, N. J.—Hundreds have been converted within a few months.

Germantown, Pa.—One hundred and eighty souls have been converted within a few weeks.

Newburgh District, N. Y.—300 converts.

Towanda, Pa.—200 converts.

Cambridge, Md.—300 converts.

Saline, Mich.—95 received on probation.

Boscawen, N. H.—Over thirty received on probation. The personal effort of principles have been successful.

Rochester, N. H.—Forty have been brought to the knowledge of the truth within two weeks, including a few cases of restored wanderers.

Millbury, Mass.—One hundred have sought and found the Savior, of all ages and conditions. The prospects of an increase of the work are encourageing.

Pittsfield, Vt.—Between twenty and thirty have found the Savior precious to their souls.

Hinsdale, N. H.—There has been a glorious work in this place. It commenced in a protracted meeting. The first two or three days were principally occupied in endeavoring to awaken professors of religion to a sense of their obligations and guilt.—Many of them confessed their backslidings, and on their bended knees made solemn engagement to consecrate themselves anew to God. Salvation soon began to come out of Zion; and, before the meeting closed, many were hopefully converted to God. The number of converts is estimated at about 40.

Westford, Mass.—A very interesting revival has been enjoyed the winter past, and it is still progressing. It has been distinguished by great solemnity. The still small voice of the spirit has been heard, and its effects in subduing the stubborn hearts of sinners have been most manifest. A large proportion of the converts are men in the meridian of life. Ten men have been hopefully converted, whose wives were previously pious. The number of converts is about sixty.

Portsmouth, N. H.—There is now an extensive revival in this place. The number of converts at last dates was estimated at five hundred. The work is progressing.

Topsham and Brunswick, Me.—These places have been favored with a general outpouring of the spirit of God. The number of those who have manifested a hope is estimated at about three hundred.

Revivals of religion were never so general in our country as at the present period. When two or three States have been favored with these refreshings, it has been matter of special notice and warm congratulation; but now we hear of them from most of the States in the Union: surely, then, thanksgivings and praises should be greatly multiplied. In most of the principal cities, reformations have been very powerful. In Savannah, Natchez, Richmond, Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Zanesville, Columbus, Cleaveland, New-York, Brooklyn, Albany, Troy, Rochester, Boston, Lowell, Portsmouth, and some others, the accessions to the Baptist, and other evangelical churches, have been very numerous.—Bap. Reg.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

Washington, March 30, 1840.

Dear Sir,—Your last paper contains interesting revival intelligence from many of the churches, refreshing to all Christians, no doubt, but especially to some of us, who from day to day mingle in the scenes of legislative debates, and witness the heated, boisterous, and often angry strifes of political contests in the halls of Congress. Much as might be done for the promotion of morality, and the happiness and prosperity of the nation, by wise and just legislation; were we obliged to rest our hope mainly on that, we might not only despair of the world's salvation, but of the stability of the Republic itself. We all know, however, that legislation cannot be expected, and is perhaps hardly to be desired, faster than the moral sense of the people at large is prepared to sanction and sustain it. It is to the saving, purifying, enlightened power of the gospel, that the patriot as well as the Christian must look for the safety of the government, as well as the church, trusting that through its blessed influences, "wisdom and knowledge shall yet be the stability of our times." Indications that the Spirit of our Lord is yet abroad among the churches, accompanying the instrumentalities of his people, and bringing to the knowledge of the truth and the obedience of the cross, great numbers of those who were "dead in trespasses and sins,"—always good news—come to us here, in this view of the subject, like a cooling and refreshing stream to the weary traveler in a parched and thirsty land.

Your paper does not contain all the accounts we get, and I desire to add here, for the encouragement of others, extracts from some letters I have lately received.—A letter from Niagara co. says—"God has done a great work in Pendleton. Meetings have been held in several places in this and the adjoining town. There have been about a dozen converted on our Ridge, as many more on Bear Ridge, twenty-six at Tonawanta Creek, several on the canal east of us, and about twenty at Shawner, three miles west of us." A correspondent from Genesee Co. says—"Much attention to religion has been awakened, and in some places the whole mass seemed to be moved. At Nunda, the work has surpassed in extent any thing I ever witnessed. No dwelling-house in that place, save the two taverns, but which now contains praying souls. The number of converts there is estimated at about 500. At Pike there has been a gracious work, at Attica, at Pavilion, and considerable interest is manifested in this town" (Perry.) A member just returned from Massachusetts, says there is a work of considerable interest in Williams College, among the students; and a letter from President Lindsley, of Ohio, gives a similar account as to a work in progress there I fear, from our proceedings, you would hardly suppose Congress contained 40 professors of religion, yet such is the fact, and about 20 of them are in the habit of meeting on Saturday evening for social prayer. Many of those seasons are deeply interesting.

FOREIGN.

SIX DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

We have just received London papers to the evening of March 6th, brought by the packet ship Montreal, Capt. Griffin.

There was a talk of a war between England and Portugal. Or rather, such was the talk at Lisbon by the last advices, which were to the 24th of February.

In the house of Commons, March 2d, Sir James Graham gave notice that if the documents respecting China were not laid before the House by Thursday next, he should move an address for the presentation of all papers relating to our commercial intercourse with that country.

On the same day, Lord J. Russell stated that he had no objection to lay before the house all the papers that have been received on the subject of the "North American Boundary;" but observed that the question was scarcely fit yet to be discussed in Parliament.

There is nothing of importance from Algiers. The French forces in Africa numbered near 50,000 men. An expedition against Abd-el-Kader was to be undertaken soon.

There had been a riot at Madrid, (Feb. 24th,) in the hall of the Cortes, but it appeared to have no ramification among the people. The city was declared to be in a state of siege.

GREAT FIRE.

Louisville (Ky.) in Flames.—We are indebted to a friend for the following extract from a letter dated Louisville, March 27, 1840.

This day I arrived here, and saw one of the largest fires I ever remember, except the great fire in New York. It originated in Main street, between Second and Third, about midnight, extending in its course on both sides up and down, to Market street, and the other side to the river; and is still raging at 6 A. M., with unabated fury, and no knowing where it will stop. They are pulling down houses, in order to stop its progress. I fear the Louisville Bank, a very fine building, said to be fire proof, will not be saved.

At 7 A. M. the fire still raging—bank out of danger. One whole block of buildings in the most business part of the city burnt to the ground. The gutters are one continued sheet of flame, owing to the liquor which has been emptied out of some of the stores. The boat by which I write will leave in twenty minutes, and I must necessarily close this account.

Strange Phenomenon.—On the night of the 17th inst. the family of Mr. James Daniels, of Cook's Manor, U. C. were awakened by a severe shock like that of an earthquake. In the morning it was discovered that a meteor, judged to be about three times the size of an ordinary farm house, had struck the earth some eighty rods distant from Mr. D.'s dwelling with a force which buried its entire bulk about eight inches below the surface.—Sandwich (U. C.) Herald.

Loss of the Sea-Gull.—We learn from the Courier & Enquirer, that there is too much reason to apprehend that the pilot boat Sea-Gull attached to the Exploring Expedition, as tender to the U. S. sloop-of-war Vincennes, has been lost, and that all on board have perished. She has not been heard of since the month of June last.—Then she left Orange, Terra del Fuego, in company with the Flying Fish. A gale soon after arose, and the latter succeeded in beating off the shore. This was the last seen of the Sea-Gull. Lieutenants Reed and Bacon, two promising young officers, were on board. The Porpoise had been twice in search of her without success.

Nantucket Whalers.—The editor of the Nantucket Inquirer says that the hearts of many of the islanders were gladdened a few days since, by the safe return of husbands, brothers, sons—lovers perhaps—from long and precarious voyages 'round Cape Horn.' Three whale ships came in sight one day, and the wharves were thronged to witness their entrance into port. It was an interesting spectacle, and one well calculated to touch the sensibilities of every beholder. It is also stated that most of the Nantucket ships have done well during the past season; one of those recently arrived, it is estimated, has cleared more than a dollar an hour, besides interest on cost, &c., from the time she sailed, until the hour of her arrival home. About twenty Nantucket whalers are expected home this year.—Boston Cent. & Gazette.

A Treaty.—The National Intelligencer says: "A treaty made with the Seneca Indians has just been ratified by the Senate, after considerable debate. The essential feature of the Treaty is its providing for the removal of the Indians westward from their present locality near Buffalo, in consideration of which the Senecas are to receive a quantity of land, equal to 320 acres for each soul, and about $400,000 in money.

Distressing Occurrence.—A most distressing accident, resulting from the careless disposition of fire-arms, occurred on board the steamboat Monongahela, on her passage up the Ohio, when near Galiapolis, on the evening of the 24th of March. From a statement in the Journal of that place it appears that one of the passengers had loaded his gun for the purpose of shooting ducks, but having no opportunity to discharge it, he rolled it up in the edge of a blanket in his berth, and there left it unknown to any person. Subsequently another person had laid down in the berth where the gun was placed, and in changing his position, thereby stirring the blanket, the gun went off, and the ball with which it was charged passed through the head of a passenger, named H. Gage, said to be from Chautauque county, New York, and inflicting such a wound as to leave no hope of his recovery.

Pennsylvania Legislature.—The Senate's resumption bill passed the House on Tuesday by a vote of 46 to 41. The house amended the Senate's adjournment resolution, by naming the 16th of April, and the amendment was concurred in by the Senate.

The resumption bill requires the banks to pay specie on and after the 15th of January, 1841, under penalty of forfeiting their charters; but holders of their notes may in the mean time proceed to the recovery of their demands under the common law.

The second section of the bill sets forth the mode of proceeding to forfeit a charter, upon refusal of specie payment after the 15th of January.

The third attaches the usual punishment of perjury to any wilful and deliberate false swearing by an officer or agent of a bank.

The fourth requires the banks that have suspended specie payments on or since the 9th of October last, to lend the state three millions of dollars, within one year in sums proportioned to their capitals, on interest not exceeding five per cent.

The fifth authorizes the banks to issue their own notes, and to make and declare new loans and dividends not exceeding six per cent.

From the Buffalo Com. Advertiser.

SHIPWRECK AND LOSS OF LIFE.

The brig Escambia, Capt. Dunham, belonging to Messrs. E. D. Hurlbut & Co. was lost at sea on the 25th of March, while on her passage from Charleston to New York, and out of sixteen persons who were on board only one is known to be saved.

The E. left Charleston on the 24th. On the next day while under bare poles, and being between Fryingpan Shoals and Cape Look Out, the wind commenced blowing from the N. E. and increased until 7 o'clock when she was knocked down upon her beam ends.

In this situation the brig continued until 9 o'clock, when she began to go down. The wind blowing violently, and the sea running very high and making a complete breach over the vessel.

Every one was washed from the wreck. The mate hung to the taffrel, and after the vessel had entirely disappeared, he succeeded in reaching a part of the poop deck, which had been disengaged by the violence of the sea, upon which he remained until Saturday the 28th ult., at 3 P. M., when he was at that time taken off by Capt. Whilden, of the schooner Marietta Ryan.

The persons on board were Capt. Rufus Dunham; the mate, Wm. Bulkley; 2d mate, Edwin Hull; J. Chamberlain, cook; and steward, Isaac Tradle; Henry Johnston, John Williams, John Peters, James Lucas, and Allen Jackson, seamen; Mr. Wilber, of Newport, R. I., and two others, names unknown, passengers. Vessel insured in this city for $16,000.

Singular Phisiological Case.—About four years ago, Thomas Bradley, of Deighton, near Haddersfield, remained in a trance for forty weeks, during which time the only sustenance he received was a little gruel put into his mouth at intervals. From this state of stupor he recovered his usual health, and resumed his labor as cloth dresser. After his recovery, he stated that though he could see no one, nor had the power to move a finger, or even a single muscle, he heard distinctly all the remarks made about him at his bed-side by his family and others who visited him. He is now again reduced to the same state, and has been so for fourteen weeks last Monday. He has only spoke once during this long period, and that was on the sixth of November last, when he very feebly said "give me some parkin." From this circumstance his mother supposes that he hears all that passes near to him, the same as when he was last in this lamentable state. He is in his twenty-third year, his pulse is hardly perceptible; the only motion observed, and that rarely is in the eye-lid, and he is reduced in a most remarkable degree. The curious visit him daily in great numbers, many from a considerable distance.—Leeds Mercury.

In Verona, on the 20th Feb. Wm. W. Grant, (son of Hon. Joseph Grant, of Oswego,) of consumption, in the 40th year of his age. Mr. G spent his life, until the time of his sickness, putting off, till a more "convenient season," a practical life of godliness. But as the hour of dissolution, and the more holy scenes which forever appear in the immediate presence of God approached, he saw his need of moral purification by faith in the blood of Jesus. This he sought and found to the great joy of his soul, which enabled him to say in the last struggle, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." He has left an affectionate companion to mourn her loss, which is his infinite gain.—Comm.

In Otselic, on the 30th ult., Mrs. Almira, wife of Isaiah Messenger, in the 20th year of her age, after a short and distressing illness. She was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and maintained a christian character. By her death the church have been deprived of an interesting member; the neighborhood have sustained a loss not soon to be forgotten; and to her bereaved husband and numerous relatives the loss will be irreparably felt.

"Where immortal spirits reign,
There we hope to meet again." J. R. B.

In Columbus, Chenango co., Mrs. Fanny Champlin, commited suicide on the evening of the 26th ult., by hanging herself in an out-house with her night gown. The deceased was about 32 years of age, and one that was universally esteemed. She has left a disconsolate husband and seven small children to mourn her untimely death. The deceased had for some time been laboring partially under a state of mental derangement. Her loss will be irreparably felt by her family and numerous connections.

Church in Scott soon after its organization, of which he has been an active member. His last sickness was borne with that resignation which is characteristic of the christian, and altho' his system was continually convulsed with pain, yet he looked forward to the time when pain, and sorrow should be done away, and his soul be with the ransomed of the Lord.—Comm.

THE BELIEVER'S ECHO.

Beli. True faith, producing love to God and man,—
Say, Echo, is not this the gospel plan?
Echo. "The gospel plan."

Beli. Must I my faith in Jesus constant show,
By doing good to friend and foe?
Echo. "Both friend and foe."

Beli. But if a brother hate and treat me ill,
Must I return him good, and love him still?
Echo. "And love him still."

Beli. If he my failings watches to reveal,
Must I his faults as carefully conceal?
Echo. "As carefully conceal."

Beli. But if my name and character he tears,
And cruel malice, too, too plain appears,
And when I sorrow and affliction know,
He loves to add unto my cup of woe;
In this uncommon, this peculiar case,
Sweet Echo, say, must I still love and bless?
Echo. "Still love and bless."

Beli. Whatever usage ill I may receive,
Must I still patient be, and still forgive?
Echo. "Still patient be, and still forgive."

Beli. Why, Echo, how is this? thou art, sure, a dove;
Thy voice will teach me nothing else but love.
Echo. "Nothing else but love."

Beli. Amen; with all my heart, then be it so!
'Tis all delightful, just, and good, I know;
And now to practice I'll directly go.
Echo. "Directly go."

Beli. Things being thus, then let who will reject,
My gracious God me surely will project.
Echo. "Surely will project."

Beli. Henceforth on him I'll roll my every care,
And both my friend and foe embrace in prayer.
Echo. "Embrace in prayer."

Beli. But after all these duties, when they're done,
Must I in point of merit, them disown,
And trust on Jesus' blood alone?
Echo. "On Jesus' blood alone."

Beli. Echo, enough! Thy counsel to my ear
Is sweeter than the dew-drop tear;
Thy wise, instructive lessons please me well:
Till next we meet again, farewell! farewell!
Echo. "Farewell! farewell!"

WELCOME TO DEATH.

The Rev. John McLeland, in the year 1680, was chosen minister of Kircudbright, in Scotland, where he labored with success till his death in 1690. He was much engaged in the education of the youth, and prepared many for the university.

Just before his death he composed the following verses:—

"Come, deathless death, haye o'er; lo, here's my pass,
In blood 'tis written, by His hand, who was,
And is, and shall be. Jordan, cut thy stream,
Make channels dry. I bear my Father's name
Stamped on my brow. I'm ravished with my crown
I shine so bright; down with all glory, down,
That world can give. I see the pearly port,
The golden street, the blessed soul's resort.
The tree of life, floods gushing from the throne,
Call me to joys; begone, short woes, begone,
I lived to die, but now I die to live,
I do enjoy more than I did believe.
The promise me into possesion send;
Faith in fruition, hope in having, ends."

DESCRIPTION OF THE CITY OF MOSCOW.

Moscow the ancient and interior capital of the Russian Empire, is, perhaps, the most extraordinary city that exists either in Europe or Asia. It presents a singular combination of whatever is most striking in both continents. It surpasses in splendor the greatest capitals of Europe, and in poverty its poorest villages. "It looks exactly as if some 400 old castles of the nobles had been transported thither, each bringing its little attendant village of wooden cottages. Wretched hovels are blended with large palaces; cottages of one story, stand next to the most superb and stately mansions; many brick structures are covered with wooden tops; some of the wooden houses are painted; others have iron doors and roofs."

"One might imagine," says Dr. Clarke, "that all the States of Europe and Asia had each sent a building by way of a representative to Moscow: timber huts from regions beyond the Arctic; plastered palaces from Sweden and Denmark; painted walls from the Tyrol; mosques from Constantinople; Tartar temples from Bucharia; pagodas, pavillions and verandas from China; cabarets from Spain; dungeons, prisons and public offices from France; architectural ruins from Rome; terraces and trellises from Naples; and ware-houses from Wapping. Some parts have the appearance of a sequestered desert, and the traveler is tempted to ask, 'Where is Moscow?' till he is told, 'this is Moscow.' Here are seen wide and scattered suburbs, huts, gardens, pig-sties, brick-walls, dung-hills, palaces, timber-yards, ware-houses; and a refuse as it were, of materials sufficient to stock an empire. In other quarters the throng is so immense, that the traveler asks, 'what cause has convened such a multitude?' and learns that it is the same every day. At some points and particular from the Kremlim, where all its deformed features are hidden, and the eye roves over the towers, domes and spires of its gorgeous temples and palaces: Moscow presents an aspect of rude and varied magnificence, which scarcely any other capital can equal. The superb edifices of Moscow are very numerous, as, notwithstanding the seat of government has been transported to St. Petersburgh, the greater number of the nobles still make it their residence. Many of their palaces are, or were, truly magnificent; that of the Pascoff family, perhaps the most strikingly so. The Kremlim however, is the most extraordinary of all the edifices of this extraordinary city. It is a sort of enclosed town, which, besides the ancient palace of the Czars, contains the two magnificent Churches of St. Nicholas, and the Assumption, numerous chaplets, government offices, houses of the priest, and other public functionaries. Its original style and pavillion-like aspect, are decidedly Asiatic; yet there are extensive portions constructed in the Grecian style. Here a pagoda, there an arcade. In some parts, richness and even elegance; in others, barbarism and decay. It is a jumble of magnificence and ruin; old buildings repaired, and modern structures not completed, half open vaults, and mouldering walls, and empty caves, amid white-washed brick buildings, and towers, and churches with glittering, gilded or painted domes.

A Russian artist presented to Catharine a most superb model, which at the expense of 7 or £8,000,000 sterling would have harmonized the whole into one palace, the most magnificent in the world; but very small progress was made in the execution. Among the wonders of Moscow is the greatest bell in the world, 67 feet in circumference, weighing 22,000 tons, and worth about £70,000; but no intention of ever suspending it seems to be entertained. Another wonder is the great gun, in which a man may set upright—but from which not a shot was ever fired. The church of St. Basil, is, perhaps, the most curious of all the structures, from the completely Tartar style of its numerous and heavy cupolas, surrounded with gilded crucifixes. It is a work of piety for individuals to bestow large sums to gild or paint one of the numberless domes of the churches, each according to his peculiar taste; whence arises a brilliant and fantastic variety. The story of Moscow has been singularly eventful. She has passed through almost unparalleled vicissitudes of war and devastation; but her recent scenes of glory and calamity, have surpassed all those which preceded. The burning of Moscow is well remembered as the marking event, which turned against the all-grasping usurper the tide of fortune. Napoleon when he entered Moscow, did not find it burning. The Russians, in retiring, left merely the combustible materials deep lodged, and sure to break forth. The flames soon appeared, and, aided by strong winds from opposite quarters, gained hourly new strength till it wrapped that vast capitol in one blaze of fire. Its proud and gilded domes either fell to the ground, or stood solitary amid surrounding ruin. The city thus rendered untenable, Napoleon was forced to commence that retreat in which a great part of his army perished. It is remarkable that the Russian Government still renounce the glory of this sublime sacrifice, and represent Moscow as burned by the French. When Mr. James visited the city in 1814, the whole space of 25 miles in circumference presented the most gloomy aspect of desolation. "A few shops and inns had been built, and looked like spots in the wide waste; but to repair the mansions of the grandees was too gigantic a work to be then ever begun; and they stood in the most neglected and forlorn condition. Street after street appeared in utter ruin; disjointed columns, mutilated porticoes, broken cupolas, walls of rugged stucco, black, discolored with the scorching of fire, and open on every side to the weather, formed a hideous contrast with the glowing pictures, which travelers had drawn of the grand and sumptuous palaces of Moscow."

In 1823, however, Dr. Lyall and Captain Cochran, found the work of reparation far advanced; and the new streets and edifices were constructed in a more regular style, though Moscow appeared still to Capt. Cochran as in Clark's time, "beautiful and rich, magnificent and mean." According to a work published in 1824 at Moscow, by M. Lecointe, 6341 houses had been burned, and 8027 had been built; so that it was larger than before; and Capt. Frankland in his recent journey confirms this observation.

On the Sparrow-hill, Alexander in 1817, laid the foundation of "a temple of our Savior," which, if completed, will be the most gigantic structure in the universe. It is to be 770 feet high, (the Great Pyramid is only 630,) having three successive churches rising above each other, the lowest of which was to be fronted by a colonade 2100 feet long. Twenty-four thousand peasants were provided, of whom 6,000 were to work at the building and the rest to till the ground for their support. The work however had not been seriously begun until 1824. According to Lecointe, Moscow contains 14,724 nobles, 3101 crown-servants, 4383 ecclesiastics, 12,101 merchants, 28,029 citizens, 10,384 artisans, 22,194 military 1854 manufacturers, 1882 coachmen 53,541 domestic servants, 72,758 peasants, 19,204 persons of various denominations, 2385 foreigners, in all 240,000.

THE MISER.

But few beings, having the form of man, are more despicable than the miser. Covetousness is one of the most contemptible passions that hold a seat in the human heart, and this he possesses in a super-abundant degree. It is, in fact, his ruling passion, the predominant principle of his sordid and uncharitable soul. Avaricious of his vast store-house of riches, he heeds not the calls of the needy and suffering. The beseeching groans of the poor widow, or the hungry, piercing cries of the helpless orphan, find not a responsive echo from the chords of his unsympathizing bosom. Pity he has not, nor commisseration for the most wretched, even though the most innocent being.

Having no social feelings about him, and no intercourse with his fellow men only to drain from them, on every convenient occasion, fountains of wealth, his dealings with the world at large are thus rendered but few, and the associations of mankind with him equally as scarce. He is a disjointed link in the chain of society—a detached segment from the great circle of the humon race.

Standing thus along, insulated from the rest of his species, with little fellowship with, or sympathy for one, the world passes by him like a phantasmagorical scene, upon which he may cast a look—ever cold and indifferently careless—or not, as his feelings may prompt.

Such is the miser, a filthy weed in the garden of mortals—an ice-berg in the warm current of manhood's reciprocal affection, chilling it and checking its naturally free course—a stumbling block in the path of those around him, forming in himself, as Milton has said of another, 'hell'—to his fellow men of no benefit—to the earth a curse, and, being advantageous to no one, yielding assistance neither to the suffering, the oppressed, nor the benighted, the sooner he is removed from us, and the fewer like him, there are among us, the better.

He is neither happy himself, nor does he wish to render others so. His great, his leading, only object of attainment is the 'almighty dollar'—the hoarding of earth's base pelf. Mammon then, being the deity, the sole god he worships, he becomes obnoxious to all good people, to the sphere of society around which he revolves, and is an eternal shadow on the disk of their sun of prosperity and enjoyment.

A Wife.—When a man of sense comes to marry, it is a companion whom he wants, not an artist. It is not merely a creature who can paint and play, sing and dance; it is a being who can comfort and counsel him; one who can reflect, and feel and judge, and discourse, and discriminate; one who can assist him in his affairs, lighten his sorrows, purify his joys, strengthen his principles, and educate his children. Such is the woman who is fit for a mother, and the mistress of a family. A woman of the former description occasionally figures in the drawing room, and attracts the admirations of the compnay, but she is entirely unfit for a help-mate to a man, and to 'train up a child in the way he should go.'

Sandwich Islands.—In our notes on these islands we have referred to the rapid diminution of the population. A late writer says—

"When Capt. Cook was at the Sandwich Islands, he estimated the inhabitants at 400,000. In 1823, Mr. Williams made a calculation and found them to be 160,000. Mr. Daniel Wheeler, a member of the Society of Friends, who has just returned from those regions, states, that they are now reduced to 110,000; a diminution of 40,000 in fifteen years. Capt. Cook estimated the population of Tahiti at 200,000; when the missionaries arrived there, there were not above 8,000.—S. C. Tel.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

MOTHER WON'T LET ME.

A number of boys with books in their hands were passing up the street on their way to school. They were talking with animated countenances, apparently on a subject of common interest. 'Hallo, Sam,' said one of them to a boy who had just come up to them, "are you going with us this afternoon?" "I do not know," answered Samuel, "mother does not know whether it is frozen hard enough to day.—I am afraid she will not let me go. It is always the way when there is any fun to be had; mother keeps me at home." "Just like my mother," replied his companion, "she is always afraid I shall be drowned, or get run over, or be killed in some way or other. She has not let me coast the street with the other boys all this winter. I must always promise to go off with my sled into the fields."

Edward Torry who was standing by the side of the two boys, was a listener to their conversation. He said nothing; but when the boys looked towards him, expecting from him some remarks on the subject, they saw a tear in his eye, which he turned away to conceal. It was not difficult to judge what were the feelings which called it forth. A glance at his mourning suit reminded the boys of their companions situation. It was but a few weeks before, that he had been deprived of an affectionate mother, and they conjectured correctly that their conversation had brought her to his mind. Edward was thinking of his mother, and his reflections were something like the following:—"These boys think it very hard to be looked after so closely, and not allowed to run into dangers, so I used to do; but the time may come when they would give the world to have some one care for them as their kind mothers do now. Oh! if I could only have my own good mother again, how willingly I should be to give up every one of my plays to please her." Now no mother ever wished to deprive her children of enjoyments. Any boy will find his mother more willing to confer a pleasure on him than to enjoy it herself. The reason why she may be unwilling in any case, that he should go out upon the water or coast in the streets or to skate upon the river, is not that she wishes to deprive him of enjoyment, but because she is afraid he will receive injury.

Sometimes perhaps the mother is apprehensive of danger when none in reality exists. She is afraid the river or bay is not frozen sufficiently when it is so; she is unwilling her son should venture upon it, though he may know with perfect certainty himself that there is no danger. Well now suppose that in such a case he should cheerfully give up his plan of skating, simply because his mother wishes it, and seek his amusement in some other way, or suppose even that he should stay at home, and have no play at all for one afternoon, if that should be his mother's wish? would this be greater privation than she has endured for him a hundred and a thousand times, and which she is ready at any time to endure for him again? Where is the boy who had rather his mother should suffer anxiety and apprehension a whole afternoon than to forgo himself the pleasure of spending it in any particular way that he has chanced to fix upon?—Youth's Magazine.

FOR THE FARMER.

From the Connecticut Observer.

CHRISTIAN FARMER'S PRIVILEGES.

The Christian Farmer ought to regard himself peculiarly happy in having an employment so favorable to habits of devotion. Either in their own nature, or in circumstances in which they must be pursued, some other occupations impede if they do not prevent devotional feeling. Not so of the Christian farmer.

"The calm retreat, the silent shade,
With prayer and praise agree—
And seem by thy sweet bounty made,
For those that follow thee."

This is truth as well as poetry, and it well describes the scenes of agricultural life.—The works of God awoke the rapturous devotions, the sweetest as well as the most exalted strains, of ancient saints. These works ought to be contemplated with the same feelings, by the Christian Farmer. If his heart pants to hold communion with his Maker, he will see the divine image in every plant and in every flower. He dwells in the magnificent temple of nature, where the sweet incense of praise is continually ascending from a thousand altars. Cold must be his heart, if it does not catch the spirit of the scene, and exclaim "The earth O Lord is full of thy goodness. All thy works praise thee!" The poet says, "An undevout astronomer is mad." He might with equal force, have said the same of an undevout farmer. How can he be insensible to

"The boundless store
Of charms which Nature to her votary yields!
The warbling woodland, the resounding shore,
The pomp of groves and garniture of fields;
All that the genial ray of morning gilds,
And all that echoes to the song of even,
All that the mountain's sheltering bosom shields,
And all the dread magnificence of Heaven!"

Where sooner than the daily resorts of the Christian Farmer, shall we look for evidences of the wisdom and goodness of God? Where shall we find proofs of his faithfulness and immutability, if not in the uniform and constant laws of nature, on which all the operations of the farmer depend for success? From year to year he breaks up the soil, and casts the seed into the ground and looks not in vain for the return of harvest. Seasons come and go in their appointed round. The same kind of crops spring from the same kind of seed—the same sort of fruit from the same trees—the same modes of cultivation produce similar effects, from year to year. But if God were not immutable, would the farmer witness this regularity? The laws of nature are only the fixed modes in which God operates. If he were to change in his power, the sun might cease to send forth beams as bright and as genial. The clouds might cease to pour down their watery treasures in so copious abundance, upon the thirsty fields. Were he to change in his plans, the cultivation which, last year, was followed by a plentiful crop, might next year, only favor barrenness. The orchards which last year were loaded with apples, might next year bring forth only poisonous berries. The meadows which, last year, were clothed with grass, and ornamented with flowers, might next year, be covered with flints and transformed into marshes. The operations of husbandry proclaim, in tones not to be misapprehended, the immutability of God.

The Bible abounds in references to agricultural scenes, and the Christian Farmer can have little tact in drawing analogies, who, with the examples of the Bible before him, is not carried forward, and raised upward, to the scenes of the invisible world, by the objects which cluster around his daily path. Poets and prophets, and apostles, and even the Son of God, he may almost fancy, have been in his fields, and written on every tree, and plant, and flower, some divine lesson. The Bible has consecrated the varied employments of the farmer, to moral purposes—and made them mirrors, in which, as he labors he can see images of things which "are eternal."

I am here Myself among the Rest.

THE subscriber still keeps 'digging' away at Bureaus, Tables, Stands, and Bedsteads, and sometimes makes other work that folks want; but he don't think it best to go into a bill of particulars. Suffice it to say, that there will be kept on hand, or made to order, all kinds of Cabinet Ware in his line of business. Having been to some expense in obtaining experienced workmen, (that folks do say can't be beat in getting up things nice,) he would invite those wishing to purchase articles cheap, durable and handsome, to "just drop in" the Ware Room ☞ one door east of the Stone Store, and directly opposite the Post Office.

THE NEW-YORKER.

THE publishers of the New-Yorker respectfully announce the commencement of a new volume of their journal on the 21st of September being the Eighth of the double Quarto Edition, and completing the Sixth year of its publication in the Folio or common newspaper form.

The New-Yorker is now so widely known as to render superfluous any detailed delineation of its character and objects. Suffice it here that the work is intended to sustain the reputation of a Weekly Literary Journal not inferior in ability and standing to any on either side of the Atlantic. About two thirds of its columns are devoted to the best Original and Selected Literature, comprising Reviews, Essays, (Scientific and Literary,) Tales, Poems, choice extracts from New Works, Biographical and Historical Sketches, &c. &c. In this department, Critical Notices of nearly all new publications of interest will be given. The remaining columns will be devoted to a condensed abstract of the Political and General Intelligence of the day, Domestic and Foreign. Under this head the returns of all important Elections throughout the United States will be carefully compiled and compared with those of former Elections, so as to give a clear exhibit of the relative strength of each political party in the several States. All political movements of interest will likewise be briefly and impartially chronicled. In fine, it will be the general aim of this paper to be first useful and instructive, then agreeable and entertaining. The steady support through the last three years of an average of more than 8,000 subscribers warrants the belief that the conduct of the work has not disappointed the hopes of its friends, while it has secured the decided approval of an intelligent public. Such as it has been it will continue to be, with the additional aid already secured in its Editorial department, to which it is hoped that still further strength will be added, by arrangements now in progress. Unwearied exertion and a fixed resolve to spare no labor or expense which may tend to elevate the character of their work can avail any thing, the undersigned are justified in cherishing a confidence that their journal will at any rate maintain the standing it has already attained in the public estimation.

The Empire State.

THE LARGEST NEWSPAPER IN NEW-YORK.

TERMS—Three Dollars per annum, or two copies for Five Dollars.

The publishers of THE EMPIRE STATE, having completed their arrangements for the Enlarged Series of that paper, will issue on Thursday, January 9th, the first number of the largest Newspaper ever published in New York. Having procured new materials wherewith to execute the printing in a style of elegance unsurpassed by any other newspaper—and having also secured such aid in the several departments, local and general, literary and political, of the paper, as to ensure its worth as a valuable FAMILY NEWSPAPER, the publishers offer it with entire confidence to the patronage of an enlightened public, and a full reliance upon their taste and discrimination for support.

We have chosen the title of "The Empire State," as expressive not only of our attachment to the interests of New York, but of the Union; for whatever interests New York, in a great degree, interests the Union—whether in prosperity or in adversity.—And, as the Empire City is the great centre of business and commerce of the country—the point also where Intelligence from the European World is first received, and from which it radiates throughout the Union; so is New York, in many respects, if not in all, the most eligible point for the establishment of a valuable National Newspaper, as the medium through which shall be diffused to the States and Territories of the Republic, the earliest Intelligence, general and political, from every part of the world.

* * * * *

The mammoth size of our paper enabling us to present weekly an amount of matter contained in no other paper—we shall labor to present such a variety, original and selected, as will suit the tastes of all classes. The Politician, the Moralist, the Farmer, the Mechanic, the Merchant, and Professional Man, the Student and the Antiquary, the lover of humor, and such as would unfold a "Map of the Busy World,"—each and all may find amusement and instruction in the ample pages of the Empire State.

Some prominent features will be given to the paper not found in any other. The utmost pains will be taken to present, at the earliest date, all important intelligence from every State in the Union—to collect and preserve Statistics and Important Facts, civil, political, and miscellaneous—to give full accounts of the proceedings of Congress, and of the Legislatures of the States—the best Speeches of distinguished American Orators and Statesmen—Memoirs of Eminent Men—Original Tales, Essays, and Poetry—Collections in the History and Antiquities of the Country—Improvements in Agriculture, and the Arts—Gems from the Current Literature of the Day—Notices of all New Works worthy of commendation—and Occurrences at Home and Abroad, commercial, monetary, or of whatever nature that can be of interest to the mass of readers throughout the country.

More, perhaps, we need not say—but submit our labors to the candid judgment of the public.

TERMS OF THE EMPIRE STATE.

ENLARGED SERIES.

The paper will be published on a Mammoth folio sheet, on paper of superior quality, and beautiful type.

The price will be $3 per annum—in all cases in advance. Two copies will be sent for $5. No paper sent until the money is received; and no subscriptions received for a less term than six months.

THE INFIDEL.

In the wide circle of human society, there is no being that calls forth the sympathies of an enlightened mind more than him who denies the written word of God, as contained in the scriptures of eternal truth. Although endowed with intellectual faculties of the highest order, still he gropes in darkness. His understanding is perverted, and therefore he has no source of enjoyment within himself. He cannot duly appreciate the blessings which a bountiful Providence has strewn around him in such rich profusion. He does not recognize the hand that stretched out the heavens like a curtain, or feel his heart dilate with a thrill of pleasure when he contemplates the handiwork of his Creator. Placed as we are here, where there is nothing adequate to the high desires of an immortal mind, and every thing is changing and fast hastening to decay—and, life is but a breath—he would rob us of those purer joys that flow from an unshaken confidence in the care and protection of an Almighty Being, whose tender mercies are over all the works of his hands. Reckless of consequences, he is eager to instil into the minds of those around him his pernicious principles.

He proudly reasons of the Great First Cause, as one of uncreated might—tells us that chance brought forth, and placed in the vast expanse of the heavens, those stupendous planets which revolve round the sun with such precision and order.—And also the great and magnificent Ocean, teeming with living things, and on whose trackless waters are borne the merchandize of nations.—And this bright and beautiful earth, on which so many millions of intelligent beings now dwell.

But the more deep his research into the hidden mysteries of Creation, the more he is lost in a labyrinth of vain and absurd speculations.

> "He could not see the light which from the Bible
> blazed—that lamp
> Which God threw from his palace down to earth
> To guide his wand'ring children home."

He wanders still farther and farther away from the path of moral rectitude. The sensibilities of his nature become blunted. The sympathies of his soul are scaled up, and he has forgotten to rejoice with those who rejoice, and weep with those who weep. And should he chance to meet in circle gay, where mirth and wine present their allurements before him, the siren song of Pleasure cannot enchain his senses with its magic spell. His feelings are wrapt too deep in his own bosom to partake of procities of friendship. He, in common with his fellow-men, experiences the good and ill incident to human life. Perhaps his aspiring mind induces him to seek after the riches and honors of this world. His efforts may prove unsuccessful, and he left to feel the bitter pang of disappointed hope! Death, that cruel spoiler of human happiness, cuts asunder his earthly ties.—Some one of his friends sicken and die.—And when he follows their remains to their last resting-place, how gloomy must be his reflections! No light from the blessed Gospel discloses to him life and immortality beyond the grave! No kind angel whispers in his ear that the disembodied spirit, which but yesterday left its shattered habitation, is now mingling its voice in the songs of the redeemed ones! And when the body is consigned to the earth from whence it was taken, how agonizing to him must be the thought, that the loved form which was once animated with such intelligence and beauty, must moulder and become food for worms! No cheering ray of light from the Eternal One reminds him of the resurrection morning, when these bodies shall be raised incorruptible and with renewed vigor, and to remain in unfading beauty! And should he be permitted to linger out his three-score years and ten, what a gloomy spectacle of human wretchedness does he present to the minds of those who can look beyond the things of time and sense! As his mental and bodily energies begin to fail, the baseless fabrick on which he rests his hopes trembles, and he feels that he has no firm foundation whereon to lean! Like the ship-wrecked mariner on the tempestuous Ocean, tost from billow to billow without compass or pilot to guide him into the desired haven, when he takes a retrospective view of his life it yields him no consolation; but it appears like the dim and fitful visions of a dream. To him the future is bounded by the narrow limits of time; and the few fleeting moments which are allotted him here are filled with unmitigated sorrow, and fearful forebodings of the misery of that world where hope, nor pardon, can never come!

O! Infidelity! how different thy influence upon the heart of man from the religion of Jesus Christ!

When the lapse of time has swept from us the cherished hopes of former years, and the dear friends we have loved, then religion comes to our aid, and binds up the broken heart, and sheds light and consolation along our path-way. O how it quiets the fears and hushes the tumults which arise in human bosoms! And when the lamp of life burns dimly, and the things of time, which have animated us so long, are receding from our view, it points us to that blissful home where expectation shall not fail, and sin and sorrow never enter.

Gibson-Ville, April 6, 1840. S.

DEATH OF LORD CHESTERFIELD.—"I saw my dear and valued friend (says Lord Huntingdon,) a short time before his departure. The blackness of darkness, accompanied by every gloomy horror, thickened most awfully round his dying moments. Dear Lady Chesterfield could not be persuaded to leave his room for an instant.—What unmitigated anguish has she endured, but her confidential communications I am not at liberty to disclose. The curtain has fallen—his mortal part has passed to another state of existence. O! my soul, come not thou unto his end." Lord Chesterfield's infidelity is too well known to require much comment.

RELIGIOUS.

From the Christian Observer.

CAUTIONS TO CHRISTIANS IN REVIVALS.

"Christians! are you in a revival? You are then in a most solemn situation. Let me give you a few words of caution.

1. Take care of your hearts. Be very penitent for your past sins, your spiritual apathy and inaction. You are very guilty. You have wandered in that dark cold night which is now passing off. Your moral sensibilities have been benumbed by its chilling influence. Be very humble. Lie in the dust before God. Feel that you constantly need his grace to sustain you in duty and in the path to Heaven. Be very thankful. What hath God wrought for yourselves, for your Christian friends and for the impenitent? Set a high value upon the revival, lest God deprive you of this blessing, if you undervalue it. Remember that you are only instruments, but that you are really instruments of carrying forward the work. If you do not your duty, the work will stop. If you don't trust in God for divine help, the work will stop. Oh! Christians, take care of your hearts. Be very humble, holy, penitent, believing, give God your heart every day and hour. Have your hearts constantly full of the revival.

2. Take care of your conduct. Shun the [illegible] evil. The world watch you now more closely than ever, and God more closely than they. See that you give the world no occasion to speak evil of you, and that you do not offend God. Let your conduct be so circumspect, so blameless, so holy, that it will be evidential of the realities, and power of the Christian religion, that it will condemn impenitent professors and non-professors, and throw them into constant distress for their guilt and danger. Oh! sinners watch you; God sees you. Take care of your conduct. If you are ungodly now, none but God can tell the injury you will do to religion and perishing souls. Take care of your conduct, or many will stumble over you into hell.

3. Take care of your duties. This work will stop, if you shrink from your posts.—It will continue and be powerful if you are faithful. Neglect no duty. Defer no duty to the morrow which God requires to-day. You must speak often to Christian friends often to impenitent sinners. Oh, how great their guilt and peril. Thou will be in hopeless despair soon unless they repent. Speak often and kindly to them—tell them plainly that they stand on the brink of hell—on that crumbling verge which hangs over the fiery lake. That the troubled billows are fast undermining their foothold.—Ah—they will soon plunge. Warn them off. Take them by the hand and lead them. Do it quickly or you will be too late. Oh! their footing fails! Pray, pray, pray for the life of their souls! None but God can save them. Stir up yourselves to take hold on God. They are sinking—pray in faith, in earnest, agonize, plead with God, and rest not till you see him stretch out his saving arm and catch them as they are sinking into hell. He will hear you if you pray. If you have faith he will convert souls. Do you believe it? Then pray and give God no rest—then urge sinners to flee from sin and ruin, and give them no rest till they come to Christ.

4. Take care of your words. You can not pray too much, but may talk too much. Be careful what you say. Don't say that you are stupid and can't feel so much as you wan't to. It is false. The professor who says this, feels more than he wants to feel—more sense of guilt in coming up to the work. It is his excuse for neglecting what he knows to be duty. It is sin for him to feel and say so; you stupid in a revival? Why don't you give up your hope? What is your hope good for?

If you can be so stupid now, I had almost said you can be stupid in hell! But no.—There will be no stupid professors and non-professors in hell. It will torment them in hell to think that they talked about their stupidity so unfeelingly in revivals, and so coldly said they wanted to feel and could not. Ah! they will feel enough in hell. Are you stupid in a revival? then give up your hope and attend the anxious meeting. Seek God before it shall be forever too late. It may be that the revival is receiving a temporary suspension. It is because you and other Christians are becoming less faithful in prayer and effort. Do you say you feel and pray as much as ever? I doubt it if you have ever been awake. You do not pray in faith. You do not use the means of grace with sinners in faith. If you did you would not ask these questions—"Don't you think the revival is at a stand? Don't you think the revival is declining?" Yes, I know it is declining in your hearts. That is the reason why you ask these chilling questions. Oh, awake, or God will frown on your soul. I say take care of your words. Christians, when they talk as you now talk, dishearten one another—communicate to each other their unbelief. Oh, they do immense injury by these questions. I say take care of your words, or you will talk down the revival. Awake! Rouse every Christian to duty. Labor with all your might, pray with your whole heart; then shall the work go forward. But remember what I say—"Take care of your words!"

HOW TO ACT WHEN TEMPTED.

The case of backsliders has lately been much impressed upon my mind. Great numbers, I am persuaded, among professing Ghristians, come under this denomination. At present I shall only offer three or four directions to the consideration of any whose case they may suit.

Every means should be used to stop the avenues of temptation, or prevent its coming in contact with the evil propensities of the heart. If there be nitre in our habitations, it becomes us to beware of fire. Such was the counsel of our Lord to his disciples, in a season of peculiar danger.—"Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." He had himself entered that field, and came out a conqueror; but he knew what was in man, and counselled them rather to avoid than court the contest. In cases where the heart begins to be seduced by temptation, it will soon become restless, solicitous, and importunate; it will moan after it, and be exceedingly fruitful in devices to get into the way of it. It will persuade conscience, for once, at least, to be silent; it will blind the mind to the evil, and paint the desirableness of the good; and if all this will not do, it will promise to be only a looker on, or that, thus far it will go, and no farther.—But if thou hast any regard to thy God or his cause, or to the welfare of thine own soul, "consent thou not."—Temptation leads to sin, and sin to death. Whatever company, amusement, occupation or connection has frequently "caused thee to offend;" that is the eye that requires to be plucked out, lest thy soul bleed in the end, beneath the stroke of God's displeasure.—Andrew Fuller.

THE TENDER MERCIES OF THE WICKED

"If sinners are less disposed to punish their sinful enemies than God is to punish his enemies; then their tender mercies are unholy and criminal. There is nothing, upon which many gross sinners more value themselves than their tenderness and compassion towards the miserable and guilty. Indeed, all sinners have more or less tenderness and sympathy towards miserable and sinful objects; and they consider their sympathetic feelings as really amiable and virtuous. But God says in his word, that "their tender mercies are cruel." They are often very unwilling to punish those whom they ought to punish; and to see others punished, who justly deserve to be punished. The tender mercies of parents often prevent them from punishing with the rod of correction their guilty children, whom they ought to punish. The tender mercies of executive officers often prevent them from informing against transgressors of good and wholesome laws; and from putting them into execution. The tender mercies of friends often prevent them from exposing one another to the punishment they know they deserve. And the tender mercies of enemies often prevent them from exposing those to punishment, who justly deserve it, or to so great punishment as their conduct merits.

This was true in respect to Saul. He was not willing to punish Agag so much as he deserved, and so much as God was disposed to punish him. Jehosaphat had no disposition to punish the king of Israel, after he appeared friendly to him, though God eventually punished him severely.—And there is no sinner in the world, that is willing that his greatest enemy should be punished eternally. But if God be not too much disposed to punish his enemies, then sinners are too little disposed to have them punished.

Their tender mercies are selfish and cruel; and would destroy the highest good of the universe. Satan undoubtedly would, if he could, unbar the gates of destruction, and let himself and all the spirits in prison go free, rather than to see himself and others reserved in chains to everlasting darkness and despair.

But is there any thing amiable and virtuous in his tender mercies? If not, then there is nothing amiable and virtuous in those who profess to desire and expect Universal salvation.

They do not hate sin, as God hates it; and have not the same disposition to punish it, that God has to punish it, according to its intrinsic demerit.—Extract.

SOME MARKS OF TRUE REVIVALS

1. In true revivals, truth will be the instrument employed. Men are to be sanctified by the truth, if sanctified at all. Error like its father, is the source and great instrument of sin. Truth is in order to godliness.

2. The effects of a genuine revival, will be apparent in all the scriptural fruits of the Spirit. Submission to the will of God, desire to promote his glory; strong attachment to the institutions, ordinances and ministers of Christ.

3. The subjects of a true revival will be meek, respectful, humble and disposed to think others better than themselves; not proud, censorious and dictatorial.

4. CHRIST will be the radiant centre and foundation of their clearest views, their strongest affections and their brightest hopes.

5. There will be a prevalent Spirit of peace, concord and good will—a disposition to remove offences and ground alienation.

9. True revivals will be characterized by acts of charity, justice and mercy.

7. Order, propriety, solemnity, attention to scriptural truth, in reading the scripture, and giving heed to the things that are spoken, will also appear.

8. There will result from a true revival, more true piety than before its occurrence. The very meaning of the term implies that its power will be especially manifest in the hearts and lives of those who have been truly converted, but who having lost their first love, are now refreshed with the early and latter rains of divine grace. To revive is to quicken into greater life and activity that which was languishing and sickly, though not entirely dead. If this work has been performed, the consequences will be apparent in the church especially, through which principally it will reach the hearts and transform the lives of the world that lies in wickedness.—Pres. Adv. and Herald.

FOR THE MINISTER.

MINISTERS OF CHRIST.

Luke xiv, 23—"Compel them to come in, that my house may be filled."

Is it so that the ministers of Christ have a power and warrant to compel sinners to come to him, that his house may be filled? Hence see then—1st, That the ministers of Christ, who are sent of him, are clothed with authority; they are, as it were, the mouth of Christ, 2d Thess. ii. 8. They are the stars in his right hand, and co-workers with him. They are Christ's embassadors; and as God sends Christ, so Christ sends them. They have the keys of the kingdom of heaven put into their hands; and the greatness of their ministerial power is evident from the great charge given to them, Jer. i. 17, 18—"Gird up thy loins, and arise and speak unto them that I command thee. Be not dismayed at their faces, lest I confound thee before them: for, behold, I have made thee this day a defenced city, and an iron pillar, and brazen walls, against the kings of Judah," &c. The power and authority committed to them is that of the Lord Jesus Christ, 1st Cor. v. 4. The greatness of their power is evident from the great challenge they get for not executing their office, and using their authority against seducers and erroneous teachers, Rev. ii. 14, 20. It is evident also from the great glory they are to have from God who faithfully execute the ministerial trust: "They shall receive a crown of righteousness, which fadeth not away," 1st. Pet. v. 2, 4. People ought, therefore, to regard their authority; for Christ hath sied, "He that despiseth you, despiseth me." 2d. Hence see the enmity of the world against Christ, that they must be compelled to come in to him; and consequently what hard work that of a gospel minister is. If he be faithful to his trust, he cannot but meet with opposition from earth and hell. Ministers must lay their account with the contradiction of sinners against themselves, and of being everywhere opposed, everywhere spoken against. If they be faithful, they must be reckoned men of contention to the whole earth; troublers of Israel; and such as turn the world upside down. If their testimony be faithful and honest, it must torment them that dwell upon the earth; and the earth will seek to torment them again, and to kill the witnesses; but they must seek the ruin of Satan's kingdom, and the repairing of Zion's desolations; and the maintaining and defending the truth, however men and devils rage!—Ralph Erskine.

THE ELOQUENCE OF THE PULPIT.

Pulpit eloquence should be the eloquence, above all, of an impressed and affectionate heart. As Mr. Simeon used to say, "of all men in the world, the Christian pastor should be a man of an affectionate heart. When he preaches, he should be the shepherd in search of the lost sheep—the bereaved parent in pursuit of the lost child. For as well might you have a marble statue to supply the place of a real and affectionate pastor." "A sermon cold and poor," says Claude, "will do more mischief in an hour than an hundred rich ones will replace." The affectionate, glowing, sanctified heart, after all, is the true source of genuine pulpit eloquence. Jerome used to say, "It is not the clamor of praise but the groans of conviction that should be heard whilst the minister preaches." And again, "the tears of the congregation form the highest praises of the pulpit orator." The anecdote of Dean Milner and Rowland Hill, here is apposite. Dean Milner had a great objection against extemporaneous preaching, thinking that it warred against the precise orthodox mode. However, being attracted by the great fame of Rowland Hill, he was led to indulge his curiosity by once going to hear him. After the sermon, the Dean was seen forcing his way, in much haste, to the vestry-room, when, seizing the hand of the preacher, in his enthusiasm, he cried out, "Well dear brother Rowland, I perceive now, that your slapdash preachers are, after all, the best preachers: it went to the heart, Sir—it went to the heart, Sir!"

FOR MOTHERS.

From the Mother's Magazine.

PARENTAL FAITHFULNESS REWARDED.

About eighteen hundred years ago, the angelic observers of Divine Providence might have beheld at Lystra in Lyconia, a little group often gathered around the unrolled parchments of the Holy Scriptures. A lad, scarce weaned from his mother's arms, is leaning upon her knee, and as he spells out the holy word, turns from time to time, to look up into her face, and hear the explanations which render it intelligible. With earnest affection she regards her child, and strives to find words and illustrations adapted to his infant mind. Nor is she alone in her happy, though anxious duty. Seated by her side is that faithful parent, by whom her infancy had been hallowed unto God. Age has softened but not dimmed the lustre of her eye, and time has but deepened upon her brow the impress of benevolence, as she beholds her maternal care renewed in her pious daughter and her gentle boy. She too watches the progress of the lesson, and shares the mother's task. The little one reads of Abel's sacrificed lamb, and the rescued Isaac, when God provided his own burnt offering, and then pauses, to hear of Him the promised, who comes to find the ransom for Abraham's seed. Again, he reads of Salem's former splendor, now the prey of the Gentile spoiler, but he reads also of the virgin-born, the IMMANUEL, who comes the Shiloh from among the descendants of Judah, to rebuild her ruins and bid her dust arise, when God, who dwelt between the cherubim, shall again dwell among his people, and "the throne of David be established forever."

The lesson ended, the lispings of the child, the rich voice of woman, and the tremulous accents of age, blend together in one of the songs of Zion. For awhile, they dwell in plaintive strain upon the fallen glories and the moral decay of the chosen nation; and now they swell into lofty praise, as they anticipate the coming triumph; "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, oh! Zion. Put on thy beautiful garments, Oh! Jerusalem, thou Holy city, for henceforth there shall no more come unto thee the uncircumcised, and unclean."

Nor is the pious duty ended. Together they kneel looking toward the Holy temple, and the child responds to the mother's prayer. The shadows of the night have gathered around them while they worship. The child is laid upon [illegible] he sinks to [illegible] and the grandmother invoke the God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, to bless the son of their seed.

Happy mother! Happy woman! Happy child! Let others flaunt in gorgeous apparel at the public spectacle. Let others smooth with down the couch of the infant hero, or flatter into imperial tyranny his youthful pride. The angels of God watch that lowly bed. The God of Jacob pours out his blessing upon that infant heart.—Obscure and unknown among the proud ones of the earth, they are the objects of heaven's observance, and Jehovah's care.

.... Years have rolled away.—There is an unusual movement among the people of Lystra. The streets resound with the cry, "The Gods have come down unto us in the likeness of men." They prepare the garlanded victims for the sacrifice. They surround with acclamations two strangers, who regard their homage with horror. One of them humble in stature, but of noble countenance answers their cry: "Sirs, why do ye these things, we are men of like passions with yourselves, and preach unto you, that ye should turn from these vanities unto the living God."—Among the astonished crowd is that infant son, now grown to early manhood. With breathless interest he listens to the message of St. Paul. He hears the announcement that the Messiah promised to his fathers hath appeared—that the Lamb of God, the reality of Abel's sacrifice and Levi's types, hath been slain—that the IMMANUEL, the Virgin Born, hath dwelt among his people. His heart, cultivated by his mother's piety, receiving the word with joy. The Holy Ghost descends upon his soul. He returns gladly to his home, and his mother Eunice, and his grandmother Lois rejoiced in the faith of Christ with their son Timothy, whom "from a child they had taught the Holy Scriptures."

Thus prepared for the blessed work, Timothy could be no ordinary Christian.—He joins himself to St. Paul. He becomes his own son in the faith, and love of the Gospel. He kindles with a zeal imitative of his masters. Thousands of souls hear the gospel gladly from his lips, they in their turn tell to thousands more the glad tidings of salvation, and the circling influence of him, who first stirred the waters, enlarge from generation to generation, until they break upon the shores of far eternity.

Who can estimate the number of souls that now rejoice, and that will rejoice in heaven, through the influence of that young apostle, who finished his course in martrydom amid the mob at Ephesus. How bright does he shine amid that starry host "who have turned many to righteousness!"

But will no reward through grace be found for those holy women, who trained him from his infancy to the work? Has his mother Eunice, and his grand-mother Lois no share, in the trophies of his apostle-ship? Oh! who will say, that woman hath no sphere of glorious achievement in the establishment of God, though the eye of public favor reach her not, in the recesses of domestic duty? How will the blood stained Semiramis, the wanton Cleopatra, Russia's flagitious Catharine, or England's haughty Elizabeth compare with Eunice and Lois, the mother and grand-mother of Timothy the apostle? Eternity will roll on, "pouring shame and everlasting contempt" upon those who sought the favor of men rather than that of God; but eternity, as it rolls, will develop fresh glory to Christ from the souls of the redeemed brought to the cross through their faithful instrumentality.

For the Register.

The following hymn I think I saw as original in "The Mother's Magazine." As I have not the copy before me, I write it from memory. Parents will do well to see that their children learn to repeat it. At the present time, the children in this village cannot fail to feel its force.

J. R. J.

De Ruyter, April 15, 1840.

This body, it must die,
And in the cold grave lie,
It must—it must,
And there it will decay,
And moulder all away,
To dust—to dust.

This soul will never die,
Nor in the cold grave lie,
No never, never;
But if my God I love,
I will live with him above,
Forever, ever.

Jesus! my Savior be,
To thee my soul would flee,
To thee—to thee;
And when I'm called to die,
O let thy aid be nigh,
To me—to me.

THE PRAYER MEETING.

Do you attend it? We take it for granted there is a prayer meeting in your church and neighborhood. If there is none, the reason doubtless is, that you, and others like you, are not willing to attend. You live in a very desert region, truly, if there are not "two or three" who might meet once a week, or even more frequently, in Christ's name to pray and sing; and speak and hear of what God has been doing for their souls. Perhaps there are as many righteous men in the midst of you as would have been sufficient to save Sodom. And surely you might have a meeting for prayer, when there are so many near you, who profess to be praying men.

But there doubtless is a meeting for prayer in your neighborhood. Do you attend? Perhaps not. And pray, why not? Have you no time? What do you find more profitable while your brethren are praying? Reading, visiting, business, all are well e[illegible]ir places, but have you so much [illegible]ne hour of the whole week in a social prayer meeting. You must be an industrious man. You are "diligent in business," if you were equally "fervent in spirit" you would add to your list of pleasant and profitable modes of spending an evening, that of going regularly and punctually to the house of prayer, not forsaking the assembling of yourselves together as the manner of some is.

Is the prayer meeting so dull that you derive no benefit from attending? This may be your own more than the fault of any one else. If none do more than you to make the meeting interesting, it will indeed be dull. If you have forsaken the house of God because the meeting was dull, others may have done the same. A remedy for this difficulty would soon be found if you would repent, and do your first works, return to your first love, seek and find the Holy spirit in your own soul, and then attend the meeting you have deserted, and there with a heart revived, endeavor to arouse others to "awake out of sleep." The meeting would not be dull to you, and others might rejoice with you. But be the meeting dull or not dull, either the meeting should be broken up, or you should attend. You know that the prayer meeting should not be broken up, and, equally well you know, that there in that meeting you should be found unless prevented from attending by the Providence of God.

P.

A WORD TO CHURCHES NOT REVIVED.

Those professing Christians and churches that are unaffected by the revival spirit which is now so plentifully abroad, are in a very critical case. The withholding of a blessing from them which is so richly granted to others, is a fact in God's spiritual providence which has a meaning. An intimation that we are to be passed by, and numbered among the people from whom God withheld his blessing in the day of his rich mercy to our land, should be taken as a voice of alarm, proceeding from the throne of God. It is a serious matter, to be left unvisited by the Spirit of God, in the day of special visitation of his churches. If such a harvest season passes, without benefit to us, we have special reason to fear, that it will be the precursor of positive judgments. Fearful was the case of the Lord's vineyard, when he said, "I will command the clouds that they rain no rain upon it." When the clouds of mercy are all about us, and a shower is falling on the right and left, there is something portentous in that providence, which holds the key of the clouds, and locks them against us. If we see the hand that guides the dispensations of sovereign mercy, marshalling the clouds, so as to carry the rain away from us, and pour it on all other fields, we have cause to tremble. The fact that our church is left to slumber, while the voice of God has gone abroad, and awoke the sacramental hosts of God's elect, is of itself full of alarm. So clear and impressive is the warning sent from heaven to us that every report of religion revived in other places, seem, as it strikes upon our hearts of adamant, to awake an echo to this effect: "If thou altogether holdest thy peace, at this time, then shall their enlargement and deliverance arise—from another place, but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed."—Puritan.

RELIGION.—Hold fast therefore by this sheet anchor of happiness—religion. You will often want it in the times of most danger, the storms and tempests of life. Cherish true religion as precisely as you will fly with abhorrence and contempt from superstition and enthusiasm. The first is the perfection and glory of human nature; the two last the depravation and disgrace of it. Remember the essence of religion is a heart void of offence towards God and towards man: not subtle, speculative opinions, but an active vital principle of faith.—Earl of Chatham.

FOR THE BACKSLIDER.

HOW TO AVOID BACKSLIDING.

Beware of the first stages of departure from God. All backslidings began with the heart, from whence are "the issues of life." Private prayer, it may be, at first becomes wearisome; there is no communion with God in it. It is then occasionally neglected; hence public ordinances cease to afford their wonted pleasure. Christian society is drop'd the world takes up your attention, and you have little or no time to spare for religion. Some carnal acquaintance, perceiving you to be coming, draws you on. He recommends you to read some one of the liberal productions of the times, by which you are to learn that there is no need to be so rigid in religion, and no harm in frequenting the theatre, or in devoting at least a part of the Lord's day to visiting or amusement. These are a few of the seeds of death, from whence have sprung many a bitter harvest.

"Beware of sin, then, crush it at the door;
If once 'tis in, it may go out no more."—Bunyan.

If thou hast in any degree been drawn aside, give no rest to thy soul till thy sin is crucified, and thy conscience reconciled by the blood of the cross. It is too common for sin to be worn away from the memory by time and new occurrences, instead of being washed away at the gospel fountain. But where this is the case, the stain is not removed, and its effects will sooner or later appear, perhaps in a form that may cause the ear of every one that heareth it to tingle. "He that honoreth me, saith the Lord, will I honor; and he that despiseth me shall be lightly esteemed." If we care so little for the honor of God's name, as to be unconcerned for secret faults, we may expect he will care as little for the honor of ours, and will give us up to some open vice, that shall cover us with infamy.—Andrew Fuller.

To back-slide from God, is a sin of base ingratitude. It is returning evil for good, and hatred for love.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, April 21, 1840.

THE SABBATH—HOW SHOULD IT BE SPENT?

The Sabbath should be regarded as a divine institution, and kept holy, in obedience to the divine authority.

In order to a proper observance of this day, right views of its importance should be entertained. Its nature and design, with its duties and privileges, should be understood. It is not sufficient to comply with the requirements of law and the usages of society, by suspending our usual worldly avocations, or even to go through the forms of worship. The heart and affections must be engaged in spiritual and appropriate exercises, or the holy hours will be attended with no benefit to our souls.

Among the duties of the Sabbath, we mention,

1. THE DUTY OF MEDITATION.—The associations which cluster around this sacred day, invite the thoughts of the christian abroad to contemplate the works of God in creation, his power and goodness in redemption, and his mercy in sustaining and blessing his church,—nay, the whole race of his creatures. The pious observer of holy time, in retrospecting his experimental course, is constrained to ascribe all his success to God; but he is also much indebted to the Sabbath as a means of his spiritual advancement. He looks forward through this blessed type of future glorious rest, to a termination of his toils; to his complete release from suffering, and his full restoration to the moral image of his Maker.

2. THE DUTY OF SELF EXAMINATION.—This duty, though necessary at all times, may be appropriately performed on this day. Anticipating an "audience with the Deity," it is natural for the considerate to inquire into the state of their own hearts previous to engaging in the more public acts of devotion.

3. THE DUTY OF SECRET PRAYER.—This important duty should occupy a portion of the sacred hours. This is necessary to fortify the mind and heart against the numerous temptations and annoyances which the christian meets even on the day sacred to holy pursuits. Watchfulness in prayer is indispensable lest the heart of the believer should be tempted even while near the throne of God.

This season is peculiarly adapted,

4. TO RELIGIOUS CONVERSATION AND THE INSTRUCTION OF CHILDREN.—Many parents have very little leisure for this important duty during the week. That they may find exemption from wordly cares and contribute instrumentally to the instruction and salvation of their children on this day, is a great blessing.

5. THE SABBATH SHOULD BE IMPROVED AS A DAY OF HOLY CONVOCATION.—God's word, the interests of piety, and the salvation of the world require it. Next to the gift of the Son of God, the agency of the Spirit, and the dispensation of truth, this institution stands conspicuous as a means of renovating the world. Indeed, in the present state of society, it would be impracticable, if not impossible, to sustain the interests of religion without it. How deep, therefore, is the guilt of those who desecrate this holy day themselves and allow their children and domestics to profane it! Can such persons have any just sense of their own responsibility, or any proper desire for the salvation of their children and their fellow men? To neglect such an improvement of this blessed day, is, in the estimation of the God of the Sabbath, to contemn his authority. It is to grieve his spirit, and expose ourselves to his wrath! On the contrary, to "call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable," is to enter into HIS views; and this, connected with a life of submission and loving obedience, brings us near him in a moral sense, and fills us with peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.

CONTROVERSY.

This is a chilling word to many persons who take it for granted that to be a Christian, implies the existence of a spirit so tame as not only to bear reproach and indignity without resentment, but to be still while the enemies of truth and order are scattering "fire-brands, arrows and death." Others exhibit the heat of controversy in opposing it. That there is much injury done the cause of truth by improper litigation cannot be denied. This is generally the case when no better motive attends than a desire for conquest. But have not the servants of God, in all ages, been under the necessity of contending as well against corruptions in the church, as against errors and sins out of it? And what has always been the preaching of the truth but to contend against the usurpations of the prince of darkness, and the abominations of an ungodly world? Men most renowned for talents and piety, for meekness and benevolence, have been most forward in opposing vice and error in all their various forms.—And when the number of the defenders of truth has been the smallest, their zeal and ardor have been proportionably intense. We may also add that the evidences of the divine interposition in their favor, under such circumstances, have been unusually forcible and clear.

But though it is important to "contend earnestly" for truth, to "uphold and rebuke" errorists with boldness, yet the spirit of kindness should be invariably cherished; such a spirit of kindness as was exhibited by the prophets towards their persecutors; by Paul, who, after having exposed the errors of his countrymen in the most caustic manner, shows his strong attachment to their true interests by wishing himself accursed from Christ, "for the salvation of his kinsman," and who, for the furtherance of truth and as a witness of its power, laid down his life with all cheerfulness. By Stephen, who, after exhibiting the truth with so much plainness as to enrage his auditors till they murdered him, in the true spirit of the religion for which he had been contending, prayed for their salvation in death.—And by the Great Captain of Salvation, who read the hearts and exposed the hypocrisy of a haughty priesthood, and the lives of a rebellious nation, and died their victim for the purpose of reconciling them to God. In such a spirit, and for such noble purposes, should Christians contend for the truth of God. But differently "the servant of God should not strive," but be "gentle, apt to teach, patient."

THE LONGEST WE HAVE HEARD OF.—One of our correspondents lately made mention of a protracted meeting, which had lasted since the first day of January, and we were inclined to think there must have been some mistake in the statement. But when we saw mentioned in the N. Y. Evening Post, a letter from Baltimore addressed to the Editors of the Christian Advocate and Journal, which stated that a protracted meeting had been held at the North Baltimore Station, "some eighteen or twenty months" continuously, our doubts were removed, and we shall probably be less inclined to incredulity in time to come on such subjects.—We are happy to learn that at the same place, within two years, twelve hundred and forty persons had united with the church.

CHRISTIAN UNION.—We invite the attention of our readers to the article on our first page, on the subject of Christian union.—The importance of a more complete union of the disciples of Christ on right grounds, must be apparent to every one who desires the advancement of true religion. We believe that greater union of feeling and views among Christians, is not only a duty, but the best policy that can be devised to accomplish the great objects for which the church was constituted. We expect the subject will be pursued in a series of articles, and have no doubt but the same candor and ability displayed by our brother in the first number, will characterize all his writings on that interesting topic.

CORRESPONDENCE.

North Hampton, Clark co., O.
March 30, 1840.

MESSRS. EDITORS—In the 1st No. of the Register you request some one to give a fuller account of the revival in this place. The work commenced in a protracted meeting, about the first of January, conducted by a "New Light" preacher. Of the fruits of this revival, a "New Light" church has been constituted consisting of about 30 members. About half of this number have united with the S. D. Baptist churches; some have united with the Methodists, and a few have not yet attached themselves to any people. The work has extended itself, and is yet in progress, and sinners of the vilest character are becoming the subjects of the regenerating grace of God. The excitement has to some extent subsided, and conversions are less frequent; but we trust much good has been done, which will be felt in time and eternity, and we hope that some more will yield themselves to the Savior. In different parts of this country there have been precious revivals, and very many have been brought from darkness to light.

You will find, by reference to a letter from Rev. L. A. Davis, published in the Sentinel, that the church in Pike was about two and half years since divided by the Temperance question. The part that left the church were organized as a separate church, assuming, as a title to distinguish them from the others, the name of the S. D. Baptist Temperance Reform church. This name has now been exchanged for the title of the S. D. Baptist church in North Hampton. Since the division, the North Hampton church has enjoyed an almost uninterrupted season of that happ[illegible] prosperity and revival, and are now, in common with some others, in possession of a very desirable and exalted state of religious feeling. They were organized with 17 members. At the time of my arrival here they numbered 80; some have since united, and others are expected to unite people, did not duty call me away to another field of labor.

I am much distressed when I consider the fallen state of the christian religion in many parts of Ohio and Virginia. A desire for purity seems to be superseded by an anxiety to increase in number. An evidence of acceptance with God, and a change of heart, is not absolutely requisite for admission into some of the churches.—The idea is inculcated that religion is love, and this when defined means not the fulfilling of the law, but good feeling, or happiness. Consequently a person can be in possession of religion, and disobey almost every requirement of God, and be destitute of almost every principle of the gospel! This is a legitimate conclusion from such a proposition. And where it is inculcated the consequences show that the conclusion is correct. Thus the religion of Christ has lost its sacred and dignified character, and become a theme of speculation. It is stripped of its holy duties and sacred principles, and set forth as a system of non-essentials—a matter of convenience.

O! when will the time come when preachers shall be ministers of God's holy truth and not partisans? when they shall lift up their voice like a trumpet and cry aloud, and spare not, and show the children of this world their transgressions, and professors of religion their sins?

Yours, religiously,
JAMES BAILEY.

For the Register.

The distance we live from God mars our happiness, and weakens our hopes of future bliss. All our degradation and misery are the fruits of sin. To draw nigh to God, in a scriptural sense, is the only way to be happy in time and eternity. The great design of our creation cannot be answered in us without an assimilation to the divine image, and conformity both in the spirit and letter to the law of love. But sin has so disqualified us for the delightful duties of religion, that while under its influence, in a state of alienation from God, we see nothing in religion to please, and nothing in Christ to admire. He appears to us a "root out of dry ground," without "form or comeliness." Our hearts are "fully set in us to do evil." We "love darkness rather than light," and we "will not come to the light lest our deeds be reproved."

In this state of mind and feeling, the great mass of mankind are seeking for happiness; some in ploughing the ocean; others in "digging for golden ore," others in sensual gratifications; others by attempting to climb the hill of fame, or repairing to the field of honor; others in an enthusiastic zeal for a false or defective religion. But is not to be found in those pursuits. The anxiety increases, till in the rejection of the only name given under heaven among men whereby we must be saved, they are the subjects of real and conscious wretchedness.

Such are the spontaneous fruits of pursuing the way of disobedience, and of standing on forbidden ground. In answer to the inquiry "where shall we find happiness"

Ephraim Maxson was appointed Secretary. Elder E. S. Bailey in the Chair.

Resolved, That we hold a quarterly meeting at this house, to commence on the 6th day of the week before the 5th Sabbath in May next, at 1 o'clock P. M.

Resolved, That this Convention recommend to the itinerant Ministers, to take measures to carry the above system into immediate operation.

Resolved, That the Secretary transmit a copy of the minutes of this Convention, for publication in the S. D. B. Register.—Adjourned.

ELI S. BAILEY, Chairman.
EPHRAIM MAXSON, Secretary.

REVIVAL RECORD.

The following is an extract of a letter from brother ABEL WARD, to the Editors of the Register, dated

SCHENECTADA, April 14, 1840.

DEAR BRETHREN—I have lived in this city about twenty-five years, and have witnessed during that period a number of revivals of religion; but I think the one we are now enjoying is the most powerful I ever witnessed. To describe it would require an abler pen than mine. The Methodists commenced a protracted meeting with the beginning of the present year which still continues. There have been received into the Methodist society between two and three hundred, besides a number more that have not united with any church.

Towards the last of January, the Baptists commenced a series of meetings which continued with preaching every evening for a number of weeks, with prayer and conference meetings in the day time. These exercises were attended with the divine blessing. There have been added to this about 60 members. The Dutch Reformed Church have also had an interesting series of meetings, which have resulted in the conversion of seventy or eighty persons. The Presbyterians have also had a series of meetings among them.

There has been a great revival in the surrounding country, which still continues.—The community generally appears to be much awake to the importance of religion. The converts are of all ages, from the child twelve years of age, to the man of gray hairs. The moralist and the infidel, the respectable neglecter of religion and the most dissolute, the profane swearer and the sabbath-breaker, have been made the happy subjects of divine mercy. To God be all the glory. Brethren, pray for the continued prosperity of Zion.

Brother N. V. Hull, in a business communication says:—

"It may be encouraging to you to hear that a number of souls have been converted among us of late, and it is quite comforting to me, to be able also to say, that there have been a number of important conversions to the Sabbath of the Bible."

CENTRE COLLEGE, DANVILLE, KY.—A revival of great power is here enjoyed;—twenty-five of the students have just been received into the church, and others are anxious for the salvation of their souls.

The work is spoken of as still more glorious in the vicinity of the College. The Protestant and Herald says, that on the fourth Sabbath in March sixty persons were admitted to the communion of the church on profession of their faith.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

Latest from China.—By the ship Albion, we have Macao dates to Dec. 3. Affairs have not materially changed. The British ships Triumph, Sir Charles Malcomb, and Cambridge, have been sold to the Americans. Reports continued that the trade was to be totally interdicted to all nations. The British say the criminality of the transhipment trade must be chargeable to the Americans.

Capt. Elliot, in a letter to Capt. Scott, of the ship Abercrombie Robinson, advises him not to risk collision between the Chinese and British, by going to Whampoa.

In the late battle it appears that there were some 8,000 on board the 29 junks, under Admiral Owan, each junk having a reinforcement of 250 militia-men, taken from their field labors and thrust on board. There were also a number of row-boats with men on board to spear the British crew as they were drowning in the water. Elliot and the rest were to have been decapitated.

Lin has reported a victory, and that the British ships ran off. The Hong merchants are very anxious for a renewal of the British trade to Whampoa.

An order of Lin, deemed spurious, is published, interdicting altogether the British and India trade, and also the illicit trade through American or other ships.

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

In the House of Commons on the 5th, Mr. Ewart brought forward his motion for leave to bring in a bill to abolish the punishment of death for all offences, which he supported in an able and very interesting speech. It was opposed by Lord John Russel, Sir Robert Inglis and others, and supported by Mr. O'Connell. The motion was lost 161 to 90.

Lord John Russell moved for leave to bring in his bill to give summary protection to persons employed in the publication of Parliamentary papers—apropos to which there was a long debate on the privilege question, and the affair of Stockdale and Hansard.

The Solicitor General opposed the motion. He was ably answered by Lord Stanley, (Conservative,) for which, by the way, his lordship is roundly lashed by the Tory papers, in company with Sir Robert Peel, who has also taken sides against the Courts in this matter.

The debate was not concluded. Before the house adjourned, notice was given for the next day, of a motion to bring up the Sheriff, and require him to give bail for his appearance and conduct, as a preliminary to his liberation.

The papers announce the death of the Duke of Marlborough, in the 74th year of his age. He was a lineal descendant from John, the great Duke of Marlborough, through the daughter of that eminent warrior.

The Paris papers contain the proceedings in the Chamber of Deputies of the 4th, among which was the "declaration" of M. Thiers, on taking office as heard of the ministry. It does not amount to much in the way of explanation, but promises full developements at an early day. The most remarkable expression, perhaps, is that in which M. Thiers says, "I have the happiness now to see my personal convictions in accordance with the intentions of the Crown."

Another approaching royal marriage is announced; that of the Princess Januara, sister of the Queen of Portugal and of the Emperor of Brazil, to the Prince Augustus of Saxe Coburg Kohary, brother to the Queen of Portugal's husband.

Plymouth, Eng. Feb. 17, 1840.—An American diver, named Scott, has been astonishing some of the people in this neighborhood by his extraordinary feats, having leapt into the water twice (on different occasions) from a very elevated position, on board the San Josef, bearing the flag of the Admiral Superintendent of the dock-yard. On the first occasion he descended from the top sail yard-arm, a height of 120 feet; and on the second, from the top-gallant yard, a height of about 190 feet.

SUMMARY.

The Hon. Thaddeus Betts, U. S. Senator from Connecticut, died at Washington on the 7th inst. Mr. Betts held a high rank in his native state as a lawyer, and has filled the office of Lieut. Governor and Judge of the Supreme Court.

After considerable discussion the bill granting to persons claimed as fugitive slaves the privilege of trial by jury, passed the Assembly of this State on the 8th inst. by a vote of 56 to 33.

We learn from the Savannah Georgian of 29th ult., that some time during the previous week the Rev. Mr. McRae of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was killed by Indians while riding his circuit within three miles of Micanopy.

Land Office Money,—It is stated in the Milwaukie Sentinel, that notes of the bank of America and of the Mechanic's and Farmer's bank Albany N. Y., are received at that land office. The Manhattan Co.'s bills are no longer taken.

The loss occasioned by the recent fire at Louisville, K. Y., is supposed to be about $300,000. It is said that $80,000 is the amount of insurance.

A quarrel recently arose between Mr. McElwee and Mr. Hegins, members of the Penn. Legislature, which resulted in the expulsion of the former from the House, for the indignity offered to it by his vile assault on Mr. Hegins.

New York Charter Election.—We are unable to give the official returns; but we presume that Varian's majority (for mayor) will be about 1500. About 40,000 votes polled.

The Monarchy of France is said to be in a critical state.

A tremendous fall of rain, attended with a heavy gale of wind, occurred at Providence R. I., and vicinity, during last week, occasioning a freshet, attended with awful consequences to the inhabitants of Johnstown. Many buildings were swept off and many lives lost.

We will give the particulars next week.

Fire at Washington.—The offices of the "Madisonian," and the "Democratic Review," were entirely destroyed by fire on the night of the 10th inst. Loss from $10,000 to $15,000.

Pennsylvania.—The Assembly have concurred with the Senate in passing the Resumption Bill in the form in which we published it yesterday; ayes 46, noes 41. It has since received the signature of the Governor, and become a law. So the Pennsylvania Banks are required to resume specie payments on the 15th of January next.—Jour. Com.

Ohio.—The Legislature of Ohio have passed a severe law against the issue and circulation of post notes, and of bills under the denomination of $5.—Jour. Com.

Treaties.—By an article of the treaty of Ghent, between the United States and Great Britain, it is stipulated that England shall not keep in commission more than two armed vessels upon each lake.

The number of sailors drafted from the fleet last year, for the flotilla on Lake Ontario and Erie, was four hundred, besides marines.—Signal.

A commodore, (post-captain,) four steam ships, and a large number of schooners and sloops have been in commission for the last three years.

A Slaver Condemned.—In the District Court yesterday, the schooner Butterfly, taken on the coast of Africa, as a vessel engaged in the slave trade, and brought to this port by a British cruiser, was condemned as having been engaged in the illicit trade, within the meaning of the act of Congress.

Military Movement.—Brigadier General Eustis, has been ordered to the command of the United States troops at Houlton, in Maine.

The force there will not exceed five hundred regulars, but their presence, and that of so discreet and intelligent an officer as Gen. Eustis, will, it may be anticipated, have the effect of keeping things quiet.—American.

Wonderful Fecundity.—An orange tree frequently yields 1500 to 2400 oranges. An elm living one hundred years, produces not less than 33,000,000 of grains; and a purple digitalis 100,700 seeds. Some plants are so prolific, that one flower producing only four seeds, would, if left to itself, in a short space of time spread from one end of the globe to the other.

Sunday Bargains in Phila.—On Wednesday, in the District Court, in Philadelphia, Judge Stroud presiding, a suit was brought by Wm. S. Berrill against several young men to recover damages for the loss of one horse & severe injury done to another, caused by their having been driven to excess by the defendants on a party of pleasure some months since, on Sunday. The Judge ordered a nonsuit to be entered, on the ground that a contract made either on Sunday or any other day for the performance of work on the Sabbath, was not legal, and therefore the plaintiff could not make out his case.—N. Y. Sun.

The New York Canals.—Amidst all the embarrassment and depression of "these times," it is cheering to notice the steady progress of business on our canals. From the annual report of the Canal Commissioners just published, it appears that the amount of property cleared on the N. Y. canals in 1839 was greater than in any former year, not excepting the famous year of speculation, 1836; and that the tolls and tonnage were likewise greater. This will more distinctly be seen from the following statement:

Years.	Tons.	Value.	Tolls.
1836,	1,310,807	$67,634,343	$1,614,342
1837,	1,171,236	55,809,288	1,292,623
1838,	1,333,011	65,746,559	1,590,911
1839,	1,425,713	73,399,764	1,216,382

The Commissioners attribute this increase to the extension of the permanent sources which supply the tonnage on the canals, and which are independent of the fluctuations of commerce and of money.—"Among these sources, the increasing population of the great West, the augmentation of its products, and the diversion of trade from other channels, are most prominent." And this remark gathers importance from the estimate of the Commissioners that scarcely one half the surplus agricultural products of the West are yet retained in the granaries of the farmers.—Jour. Com.

LONDON versus NEW-YORK.

The following table compiled from official documents show a tremenduous exchange against our city, of mortality and crime for last year.

	In London.	In New York.

London has from one to two millions of people. New-York 300,000, yet here are seventeen distinct murders in one year; twenty-eight persons smothered or made away with in that way: one hundred and seventy-nine destroyed, nobody knows how; besides burning and drowning, and accidents, and riots, and fires, of all kinds.—Whence all this? We answer, and let every man in our city hear it, in NEW-YORK THERE ARE FIVE GROG SHOPS WHERE THERE IS ONE IN LONDON.

Mexico.—The New Orleans papers bring late and interesting inteligence from Mexico—how the Federalists, abandoning in despair their attempts to overthrow the existing central government, have established a new and separate republic including some of the northern provinces, which they have called the "Republic of Rio Grande;" how they have organized by the appointment of a President and other officers of state—and how sundry Mexicans of distinction joined them.

IMPORTANT FROM LAGUNA.—Triumph of the Federalists.—The arrival of the ship Kingston, after a short passage, brings dates from Laguna as late as the 11th instant. The political movements going forward in that quarter are highly important, indicating a speedy triumph of the cause of Federalism in Mexico. On the 10th instant, an insurrection broke out in Laguna, which was attended with entire success. The people rose en mass and declared for Federalism. The commandant opposed the demonstration and issued his proclamation, but the populace, little heeding his threatenings, proceeded in their measures of revolution. The fort was captured without resistance, and the whole place is now in possession of the Federalists. The first step the Federalists took after becoming masters of Laguna, was to declare the port free to all nations; thus manifesting a liberality of feeling and sentiment, and a disposition to encourage a friendly intercourse with foreign governments. In the interior, the same success attended the cause. At Merida, the capital of Yucatan, an army of from 3 to 4000 Federalists were assembled to march against Campeachy. This place was still in the hands of the Centralists, but its speedy reduction by the large force the Federalists had brought into action, was expected. After this, we may anticipate soon to hear that Federalism is triumphant over the whole of the Southern provinces of Mexico.

The Navy.—Among the resolutions passed in the Senate of the United States last week was one, that the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to enquire into the expediency of giving a more perfect organization to the Navy, by creating the rank of Admiral, and limiting, by law, the number of officers in the existing ranks. We are pleased to see much done toward paying a proper attention to the interests and reputation of the Navy. For a commercial nation like the United States, this important branch of the public service is grossly and shabbily neglected.

The creation of the rank of Admiral is a step to which the public attention has been repeatedly called by the friends of the Navy. The only objection that we have heard urged against it is that it is anti-republican; but we are at a loss to conceive how it is more so than the title of General. Our officers have been exposed to inconvenience, and placed frequently in unpleasent position, by the rules of Naval etiquette, which preclude a reciprocity of courtesies between officers of different nominal ranks. There is no reason in the world why the highest rank in the American Naval service should not be put on a par with the same standing in the service of other nations.—Tatler.

RICHMOND, VA., April 10, 1840.

The affair in the Bank of Virginia, leaves the Manhattan in the back ground. Mr. Beverly Dabney, first teller, has absconded a defaulter for some $300,000, and report runs up the sum to half a million. Great knavery has been practised out of doors, as well as in. The Governor has issued his proclamation offering a reward for the apprehension of Dabney, and the President of the Bank has done the same. Dabney allowed accounts to be overdrawn by his acquaintance to large amounts, who cannot now "toe the mark," and so has been obliged to give "leg bail." The excitement here is immense. Dabney has sustained heretofore a most excellent moral character, and has been in the Bank eleven years.—Jour. Com.

POETRY.

From the Knickerbocker.

THE SEA.

Emblem of Everlasting power, I come
Into thy presence!—as an awe-struck child
Before its teacher. Spread thy boundless page,
And I will ponder o'er its characters,
As erst the glad disciple sought the lore
Of Socrates or Plato. Yon old rock
Hath heard thy voice for ages, and grown gray
Beneath thy smitings—and thy wrathful tide
Even now is thundering 'neath its caverned base
—Methinks it trembleth at the stern rebuke!
Is it not so?

Speak mildly, mighty Sea!
I would not know the terrors of thine ire—
That vex the grasping mariner, and bid
The wrecking argosy to leave no trace,
Or bubble, where it perished. Man's weak voice,
Though wildly lifted in its proudest strength,
With all its compass, all its volumed sound,
Is mockery to thee.

Earth speaks of man—
Her leveled mountains and her cultured vales,
Town, tower, and temple, and triumphal arch—
All speak of him, and moulder while they speak.
—But of whose architecture and design
Speak thine eternal fountains, when they rise
To combat with the cloud, and when they fall?
Of whose strong culture tell thy sunless plains,
And groves, and gardens, which no mortal eye
Hath seen and lived?

What chiseled skill hath wrought
Those coral monuments, and tombs of pearl,
Where sleeps the sea-boy, 'mid a pomp, that earth
Ne'er showed her buried kings?

Whose science stretched
The simplest line to curb thy monstrous tide,
And, graving 'Hitherto' upon the sands,
Bade thy mad surge respect it? From whose loom
Came forth thy drapery, that ne'er waxed old,
Nor blancheth 'neath stern winter's direst frost?
—Who hath thy keys, thou Deep!—Who taketh note
Of all thy wrath?—Who numbereth the host
That find their rest with thee?—What eye doth scan
Thy secret annals, from creation locked
Close in those dark, unfathomable cells,
Which he who visiteth hath ne'er returned
Among the living?

Still but one reply;
Do all thine echoing depths, and crested waves
Make the same answer?—of that One Dread Name,
Which he who deepest plants within his soul,
Is wisest, though the world doth call him fool—
—Therefore, I come a listener to thy lore,
And bow me at thy side, and lave my brow
With thy cool billow,—if perchance my soul,
That fleeting wanderer on the shore of time,
May, by thy voice instructed,—learn of God.

MISCELLANEOUS.

FAMILY DUTIES.

The results which accrue from the performance of these duties are manifold and important. It exerts a strong influence to make men good. The higher virtues all find their best exercises, are cherished and grow vigorously in the family circle. There is a genial soil, and an atmosphere pregnant with the elements of moral life. If piety find not here exciting and life-giving causes, all the world beside must be barren, a moral waste, and desolate. It makes good citizens. The elements of all government exist in the family. The citizens of every state there receive their first lessons. If they are not governed there, they will not be easily reduced to it on any terms which will suit to be anything else but slaves. Unless they have been taught obedience as a duty, and rendered it on principle and voluntarily, they may be suited to be instruments of tyranny, but will never be valuable materials for the perfection and defence of republican institutions. It makes good fathers and mothers. None but dutiful children will, in their turn be good parents. If they have rebelled under the law they will prove oppressors in its administration. As he is only fitted to command who has learned to obey, so to have passed successfully and faithfully through the duties of childhood prepares most eminently to rule a household. The faithful performance of filial duties contributes much to make happy families. Where all vie to perform most assiduously the requirements of the law, it needs nothing but good laws to make a happy community, whether that community be a family, a commonwealth, or an empire. Finally, the faithful performance of these domestic duties prepares for a peaceful end. The sick chamber has strong consolations, where peace has reigned in a family during its days of health and prosperity. Quietness will attend the evening of that day which has been passed in acts of duty and devotion. How interesting the scene of separation with those who have lived in peace, who have attuned every chord to harmony, and fill up life with acts of love and mercy. There is heaven; and the upper world only furnishes a more perfect harmony without temptation to sin, or liability to discord. Wherever such a family is gathered, blessed are the parents in the children, and the children in the parents.

REV. ROWLAND HILL.

We have all had the short-hand writers from London to take down his sermons; but the moment (it might be said) he got "under weigh," they invariably laid down their pens in utter amazement and despair. Indeed nothing but an active mind and close attention could keep up with him, so as to take in his ideas as he uttered them; to write them was impossible. His powers of amplification were unlimited; he would run through eight or ten epithets in a breath, each one changing the grandeur of the thought. When arrived at this state it was evident he was dead to all external objects, and was revelling among the magnificent images of his fancy.

* * * * * *

When I called upon Mr. Hill, I generally found him with a book in one hand and a pipe in the other; and often in such agony with the pain in his back, that, to alleviate it, he would lie his whole length upon the floor; even in this position I have found him smoking and reading. He told me that he had read more of Latin and Greek than of his own language; and in a conversation he had with Mr. Green, he said, "Do you know, sir, for the last five or six weeks I have read from five o'clock in the morning, until seven or eight at night? I mean, literally reading, sir, without ever going out except now and then on an evening." He looked pale: I said, "Sir, you will only injure your health by such hard study." "Oh, sir," he replied, "I find I am obliged to do so. I have no pleasure in walking out, and it occupies my mind; besides, sir, you know I have many reading men in my congregation, and I must keep the upper hand. I should not like any of my hearers to know more than myself. I have given up reading modern publications—they are so verbose that I can get few ideas from them; yet when I take one up, I cannot lay it down till I read it through, sir; then I am vexed and dissatisfied at the waste of time; besides, I like to go to the originals, sir, and drink at the fountain of knowledge."—Gardner's Music and Friends.

THE MURDER OF SOULS.

[Furnished by a Foreign Missionary.]

In a foreign port where is stationed a seamen's chaplain from England, the Bethel flag was hoisted one Sabbath, on board the American ship ——. The congregation consisted of upwards of forty American and English captains and seamen, all of whom listened, apparently with deep interest, to a plain and faithful exhibition of the claims of the Gospel, by the Rev. Mr. ——. The preacher seemed unusually animated, and there was a response to his own feelings, in the fixed and solemn attention of his audience.

The ship was going to sea, on the following day, and immediately after the services, the crew were ordered to work, in order to put the vessel in preparation for taking advantage of the early ebb tide of the next morning. The captain, though not a religious man, yet professed to regard the Sabbath day; but in this case, interest took the precedence of every other consideration. At an evening hour, when the work was all finished, and the men were leisurely eating their evening meal, on their forward deck, a passenger who felt an interest in their spiritual condition, went forward to hold some conversation with them on the vast concerns of the soul. Their minds seemed unusually obdurate, and it was some time before they would quietly listen to a word from his lips. At length the passenger succeeded in getting them seated around him. He found that their peculiar state of mind had been induced by the fact that they had been compelled to work on the Sabbath day.

One of the hardiest among them at length made the following most effecting concession. "That gentleman," said he, "did preach beautifully to-day. I must confess, I did to-day, what I have not done for twenty years before; I shed a tear, when that gentleman told us how great sinners we are: but, as soon as I went down into the hold to work it was all gone. There is no chance for a man to attend to his soul in such a ship as this."

Ah! how little did that captain think of the dreadful consequences that might follow from compelling his men to violate the holy Sabbath day! For the sake of advancing the poor temporal interests of himself and his owners, he was willing to put to hazard the eternal destinies of all his men! If that awakened man had had an opportunity for quiet retirement and meditation, the impressions received under that sermon, might have resulted in his conversion. Now who can tell but that was the turning point in his life of probation, and thus his captain has been the murderer of his soul!—Pastor's Journal.

IMPROPRIETIES IN PUBLIC WORSHIP.

The follwing anecdote from the Countess of Huntingdon's Life and Times, is well worthy the attention of Clergymen, some of whom we doubt not occasionally lay themselves open to a rebuke, similar to the one given by the British Roscius:—

GARRICK AND DR. STONHOUSE.—Dr. Stonhouse is said to have been one of the most correct and elegant preachers in the kingdom. When he entered into holy orders he took occasion to profit by his acquaintance with Garrick, to procure from him some valuable instructions in elocution. Being once engaged to read prayers and to preach at a church in the city, he prevailed upon Garrick to go with him. After the service, the British Roscius asked the Doctor what particular business he had to do when the duty was over? "None," said the other. "I thought you had, (said Garrick) on seeing you enter the reading desk in such a hurry." "Nothing (added he) can be more indecent than to see a clergyman set about sacred business as if he was a tradesman, and go into the church as if he wanted to get out of it as soon as possible." He next asked the Doctor, "What books he had in the desk before him?" "Only the Bible and Prayer-book." "Only the Bible and Prayer-book (replied the player,) why you tossed them backwards and forwards, and turned the leaves as carelessly as if they were those of a day-book and ledger." The Doctor was wise enough to see the force of these observations, and ever after avoided the faults they were designed to reprove.

As we must render an account for every idle word, so likewise for our idle silence.

TRUE BENEVOLENCE.

True benevolence inspires with love of justice, and prompts him in whom it glows, neither to oppress the weak, to impose on the ignorant, nor to overreach the unwary; but to give every man his due, and with steady and undeviating steps to walk in the hallowed path of equality. Deceit and dissimulation, fraud and falsehood, are far from the humble worshipper of God: integrity is enthroned in his heart; truth dwells on his lips, and enlightened sense of duty regulates the whole of his conduct.—He faithfully performs every promise, and fulfils every engagement. Others respect and trust his word, because he respects and holds it sacred himself. His life is characterized by the simplicity of truth, and the dignity of virtue: and in dealing with him, they who have an opportunity of knowing his character, place undoubted confidence in his justice and faithfulness.

A CHINESE MAP OF THE WORLD.—It is two feet wide by three and a half high, and is almost coverd with China! In the left hand corner, at the top, is a sea, three inches square, in which are delineated, as small islands, Europe, England, France, Holland, Portugal, and Africa. Holland is as big as all the rest, and Africa is not so big as the end of one's little finger! The northern frontier is Russia, very large. The left corner, at the bottom, is occupied by "the western ocean," as it is called, containing Malay peninsula pretty well defined. Along the bottom are Camboja, Cochin China, &c., represented as moderate sized islands, and on the right is Formosa, larger than all the rest put together. I should have given an engraving of this curious map but that a true reduction to the size of a page would have left out most of these countries altogether. The surrounding ocean is represented as huge waves, with smooth passages, or highways branching off to the different countries, or islands, as they represent them. They suppose that ships which keep along these higways go safely; but if they, through ignorance or stross of weather, diverge, they soon get among these awful billows, and are lost.—Malcomb's Travels.

NEWSPAPER PUBLISHING.—The Editor of the Northampton Courier reads a homily to him of the Springfield Gazette, for enlarging his paper, and concludes with the following very just remarks:

"Extra efforts to gratify, meet no response, not even punctuality in paying subscriptions, and additional outlays only seem to make people more exacting and tyrannical. The only way is to go right ahead, in a straight forward, independent course, publish a moderate sized paper, giving people about a fair compensation, their money's worth of reading, and if this don't succeed, why any Editor can split wood, or eat saw-dust bread for a living.

PROMPT ANSWER.—Chateauneauf, keeper of the seals of Louis XIII. when a boy of only nine years old, was asked many questions by a bishop, and gave very prompt answers to them all. At length the prelate said, "I will give you an orange if you will tell me where God is." "My lord," replied the boy, "I will give you two oranges if you will tell me where he is not."

NATIONAL ARMIES.—It has been computed that, in Prussia, there is one soldier in eighty inhabitants; in Austria, one in a hundred and eighteen; in France, one in a hundred and forty-two; in England, one in two hundred and twenty-nine; and in Russia, one in fifty-seven.

UNPROFITABLE DELIBERATION.—One half of human life is made up of wasted consideration. The highways of the world are strewed with the sand of thoughts cast away. The events over which we have no control, affect our destiny a thousand fold more than the few that we can govern; and while we ponder over our decision, fate decides for us, and the game is played.

FOR THE WIDOW.

THE WIDOW.

It was a cold and bleak evening in a most severe winter. The snow was driven by the furious north wind. Few dared or were willing to venture abroad. It was a night which the poor will not soon forget.

In a most miserable and shattered tenement, somewhat remote from any other habitation, there then resided an aged widow, all alone, and yet not alone.

During the weary day, in her excessive weakness, she had been unable to step beyond her door stone, or to communicate her wants to any friend. Her last morsel of bread had been long since consumed, and none heeded her destitution. She sat at evening, by her small fire, half famished with hunger—from exhaustion unable to sleep—preparing to meet the dreadful fate from which she knew not how she should be spared.

She then prayed that morning. "Give me this day my daily bread;" but the shadows of evening had descended upon her, and her prayer had not been answered.

While such thoughts were passing through her weary mind, she heard the door suddenly open and shut again, and found deposited in her entry by an unknown hand, a basket crowded with all those articles of comfortable food, which had the sweetness of manna to her.

What were her feelings on that night, God only knows! but they were such as rise up to him—the Great Deliverer and Provider, from ten thousand hearts every day.

Many days elapsed before the widow learnt through what messenger God had sent to her that timely aid. It was at the impulse of a little child, who on that dismal night, seated at the cheerful fireside of her home, was led to express the generous wish that that poor widow, whom she had sometimes visited, could share some of her numerous comforts and cheer. Her parents followed out the benevolent suggestion; and a servant was soon despatched to her mean abode, with a plentiful supply.

What a beautiful glimpse of the chain of causes, all fastened to the throne of God! An angel, with noiseless wing, came down, stirred the peaceful breast of a child, and, with no pomp or circumstance of the outward miracle, the widow's prayer was answered.—The Watchtower.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE BUCKET.

BY SAMUEL WOODWORTH.

How dear to this heart are the scenes of my childhood,
When fond recollections present them to view!
The orchard, the meadow, the deep tangled wild wood,
And every loved spot which my infancy knew;
The wide-spreading pond, and the mill which stood by it;
The bridge, and the rock where the cataract fell;
The cot of my father, the dairy-house nigh it,
And e'en the rude bucket that hung in the well!
The old oaken bucket, the iron-bound bucket,
The moss covered bucket, which hung in the well.

That moss-covered vessel I hail as a treasure;
For often, at noon, when returned from the field,
I found it the source of an exquisit pleasure,
The purest and sweetest that nature can yield.
How ardent I siezed it, with hands that were glowing,
And quick to the white-pebbled bottom it fell;
Then soon, with the emblem of truth overflowing,
And dripping with coolness, it rose from the well.
The old oaken bucket, the iron-bound bucket,
The moss-covered bucket arose from the well.

How sweet from the green mossy brim to receive it,
As poised on the curb it inclined to my lips!
Not a full blushing goblet could tempt me to leave it,
Though filled with the nectar that Jupiter sips.
And now, far removed from the loved situation,
The tear of regret will intrusively swell,
As fancy revisits my father's plantation,
And sighs for the bucket which hung in the well.
The old oaken bucket, the iron-bound bucket,
The moss-covered bucket that hung in the well.

FOR THE FARMER.

MAPLE SUGAR.

Gov. Hill, in his Family Visitor, urges upon his readers the importance of attending to the business of making maple sugar, the present year. He says there are probably sufficient maple trees in New Hampshire, Maine and Vermont, to furnish half the sugar and molasses necessary for the consumption of their inhabitants. Every pound produced will save at home the price of the cost, and the duty on the pound of imported sugar, whose place it will supply. The cost of sugar imported into the United States, at prices averaging from four cents and a half, to eight cents for the superior sugar, during the year 1838, exceeded seven millions and a half of dollars. The duty paid to Government on this sugar amounted to nearly three millions of dollars; and the merchant and retailer exact no less profit on the duty, than on the original cost. The editor says, that from present appearances the flow of maple sap will be more than common in abundance the present spring.

BEE MOTH.—Mr. James Thatcher, author of the "American Orchadist;" &c. &c., in a communication to the New England Farmer, says, "I will embrace this opportunity to communicate, for the benefit of the cultivator, what I believe to be an infallible remedy against the bee moth, which has proved so destructive to bees throughout our country of late years.—The remedy is simple and easily applied. It consists merely in covering the floor board on which the hive stands, with common earth, about an inch thick. A hive set on earth will never be infested with worms, for the bee moth will not deposite her eggs where the earth will come in contact. She naturally resorts to a dry board as her element. The remedy has been employed by a number of persons in this vicinity for several years, with the most complete success."

SORREL.—A great pest on the farm is the common sorrel, not only being useless in itself, but occupying ground which might be filled with profitable herbage. Sorrel, too, while it springs from our soils, contributes to increase that sourness, by depositing in the earth the acid which the plant has the power of secreting. To destroy sorrel, it is only necessary to destroy or neutralize the acid essential to its growth; and that is fortunately within the power of every farmer by the application of lime.—Lime and sorrel cannot exist together; the alkali of the one is fatal to the other, and where the sourness of the soil is corrected, the sorrel will disappear as a matter of course. A writer in the Farmer's Cabinet says:

"We had a few acres infested with sorrel, much to our inconvenience; on a part of this we spread sixty-six bushels and two thirds of lime to the acre, on the balance we spread 200 bushels of ashes. The sorrel on the limed part has nearly disappeared, while on the portion on which ashes were spread, it is as thick as ever."—Cultivator.

RHUBARB.—This excellent plant should have a place in every garden. It is very easily raised, requiring nothing more than a rich loomy situation. It is an orchard in miniature, the stems of its leaves affording a substance which is an excellent substitute for apples, to make sauce or pies. The sauce made from it, is very wholesome and palatable, and will be a good preventative of bowel complaints. It is said that by stewing it with sugar and preparing it in the same manner as for the table, it may be bottled and corked up tight and preserved till winter. Indeed, we cannot see why it may not be kept as long as apple sauce, or any of the berries that are preserved in this way, without being bottled up. Some of our good housewives, had better try the experiment.—Maine Farmer.

THE NEW-YORKER.

THE publishers of the New-Yorker respectfully announce the commencement of a new volume of their journal on the 21st of September being the Eighth of the double Quarto Edition, and completing the Sixth year of its publication in the Folio or common newspaper form.

The New-Yorker is now so widely known as to render superfluous any detailed delineation of its character and objects. Suffice it here that the work is intended to sustain the reputation of a Weekly Literary Journal not inferior in ability and standing to any on either side of the Atlantic. About two thirds of its columns are devoted to the best Original and Selected Literature, comprising Reviews, Essays (Scientific and Literary,) Tales, Poems; choice extracts from New Works, Biographical and Historical Sketches, &c. &c. In this department, Critical Notices of nearly all new publications of interest will be given. The remaining columns will be devoted to a condensed abstract of the Political and General Intelligence of the day, Domestic and Foreign. Under this head the returns of all important Elections throughout the United States will be carefully compiled and compared with those of former Elections, so as to give a clear exhibit of the relative strength of each political party in the several States. All political movements of interest will likewise be briefly and impartially chronicled. In fine, it will be the general aim of this paper to be first useful and instructive, then agreeable and entertaining. The steady support through the last three years of an average of more than 8,000 subscribers warrants the belief that the conduct of the work has not disappointed the hopes of its friends, while it has secured the decided approval of an intelligent public. Such as it has been it will continue to be, with the additional aid already secured in its Editorial department, to which it is hoped that still further strength will be added by arrangements now in progress. If unwearied exertion and a fixed resolve to spare no labor or expense which may tend to elevate the character of their work can avail any thing, the undersigned are justified in cherishing a confidence that their journal will at any rate maintain the standing it has already attained in the public estimation.

H. GREELEY & CO.

The Empire State.

THE LARGEST NEWSPAPER IN NEW-YORK.

TERMS—Three Dollars per annum, or two copies for Five Dollars.

The publishers of THE EMPIRE STATE, having completed their arrangements for the Enlarged Series of that paper, will issue on Thursday, January 9th, the first number of the largest Newspaper ever published in New York. Having procured new materials wherewith to execute the printing in a style of elegance unsurpassed by any other newspaper—and having also secured such aid in the several departments, local and general, literary and political, of the paper as to ensure its worth as a valuable FAMILY NEWSPAPER, the publishers offer it with entire confidence to the patronage of an enlightened public, and a full reliance upon their taste and discrimination for support.

We have chosen the title of "The Empire State," as expressive not only of our attachment to the interests of New York, but of the Union; for whatever interests New York, in a great degree, interests the Union—whether in prosperity or in adversity.—And, as the Empire City is the great centre of business and commerce of the country—the point also where Intelligence from the European World is first received, and from which it radiates throughout the Union; so is New York, in many respects, if not in all, the most eligible point for the establishment of a valuable National Newspaper, as the medium through which shall be diffused to the States and Territories of the Republic, the earliest Intelligence, general and political, from every part of the world,

* * * * * *

The mammoth size of our paper enabling us to present weekly an amount of matter contained in no other paper—we shall labor to present such a variety, original and selected, as will suit the tastes of all classes. The Politician, the Moralist, the Farmer, the Mechanic, the Merchant, and Professional Man, the Student and the Antiquary, the lover of humor, and such as would unfold a "Map of the Busy World,"—each and all may find amusement and instruction in the ample pages of the Empire State.

Some prominent features will be given to the paper, not found in any other. The utmost pains will be taken to present, at the earliest date, all important intelligence from every State in the Union—to collect and preserve Statistics and Important Facts, civil, political, and miscellaneous—to give full accounts of the proceedings of Congress, and of the Legislatures of the States—the best Speeches of distinguished American Orators and Statesmen—Memoirs of Eminent Men—Original Tales, Essays, and Poetry—Collections in the History and Antiquities of the Country—Improvements in Agriculture, and the Arts—Gems from the Current Literature of the Day—Notices of all New Works worthy of commendation—and Occurrences at Home and Abroad, commercial, monetary, or of whatever nature that can be of interest to the mass of readers throughout the country.

More, perhaps, we need not say—but submit our labors to the candid judgment of the public.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

EDITED BY AN ASSOCIATION OF MINISTERS. DEVOTED TO RELIGION, LITERATURE, AND GENERAL INTELLIGENCE. PUBLISHED BY GREENE, CAMPBELL, AND BURDICK.

VOLUME I. DE RUYTER, MADISON COUNTY, N. Y., THIRD-DAY, APRIL 28, 1840. NUMBER 8.

RELIGIOUS.

TRUTH AND CHARITY.

The spirit of Christianity is entirely liberal in its desires, prayers, efforts and communications, but not of course in its opinions; for there is no room for liberality in reference to these. A liberal christian, if the terms be intended to characterize him with respect to his religious sentiments, is an absurdity. We must believe according to the facts and evidences within our reach. What it appears to us that the Scriptures teach, after a close and careful examination of them, we must believe. And were our hearts enlarged to entertain all the charity of heaven, it could not alter our belief. Charity can never affect our belief, but by first affecting the things believed. We can change our creed only by changing, what is manifestly impossible, the facts and truths comprehending our creed. We often hear it said by men, that they have charity for all, meaning thereby, that they believe all are in a safe condition in reference to a future state, or that those who live under the influence of Paganism or Mahomedanism, are about as well off, as those who live under the Christian system, and one Christian denomination scarcely to be preferred to another. Now whether there be truth in this, is another question, but there is certainly no charity in it. There may be charity in connection with this belief. But there may be quite as much in connection with the opposite belief. Charity does not qualify opinions, but affections and actions. Feel charitable, act charitably, think truly, if one's charity is to be decided by his own opinions, as in common parlance, liberal or illiberal, then what was He in respect of charity, who said, "Strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leads to life, and few there be that find it." Was he not charitable, yea, charity's self? Yet you see what an opinion he expressed. "It is said we "must have charity;" so we must, else with all things beside we are nothing; but we must also know what charity is. Whether he is not the more charitable, who goes and spends his life and employs his talents in the self-denying services of a missionary to the heathen, even supposing him to act on an error in judgment, than he who stays at home and sitting in the midst of his comforts, proclaim that the heathen are as well off without the Gospel as with it? I cannot help deciding in favor of the former, that he is more like Paul—like Jesus. Ah, it is easy to talk charitably, and if you like the language, to think charitably; but to entertain charity in the heart and to enthrone it there, and from its deep impulses to act and to endure, with constancy and without wearying, therein lies the difficulty of charity, "the labor of love." Paul would not have been considered very charitable in his opinions: but in his desires, in his deeds, and in his ordinances; what mere mortal ever went beyond him?—Nevins.

PRAYING FOR THE SICK.

"A vague and indefinite way of praying for the sick, may be productive of the most alarming consequences; while at such a period—when fears are alive and active, and the unhappy patient is eager in the observance of every thing that may seem to throw light upon his condition, the manner of your address to the throne of grace on his behalf, if judiciously adapted to his case may, by the blessing of God, be rendered eminently useful to his soul. I remember an anecdote to this effect related by Dr. Mason, of New York.

"Dr. Mason was requested to visit a lady in dying circumstances in that city, who with her husband openly avowed infidel principles, though they attended on his ministry. On approaching her bed-side, he asked her if she felt her self a sinner, and her need of a Savior. She frankly told him she did not; and that she believed the doctrine of a Mediator to be a farce! 'Then,' said the doctor, 'I have no consolation for you—not one word of comfort. There is not a single passage in the Bible that warrants me to speak peace to one who rejects the Mediator provided. You must take the consequence of your infidelity.' So saying, he was about leaving the room, when some one said—"Well, if you cannot speak consolation to her, you can pray for her." He assented; and kneeling down by her bedside, prayed for her as a guilty sinner just sinking into hell; and then left the house. To his utter astonishment a day or two after he received a message from the lady, earnestly desiring that he would visit her without delay. What was his amazement when, on entering the room, she held out her hand to him, and with a benignant smile said—"It is all true—all that you said on Sunday is true. I have seen myself the wretched sinner you described me to be in prayer. I have seen Christ to be that all-sufficient Savior you said he was—and God has mercifully snatched me from the abyss of infidelity in which I was sunk, and placed me on the rock of ages. There I am secure—there I shall remain—I know whom I believed." All was like a dream to him. But she proceeded and displayed as accurate a knowledge of the method of salvation revealed in the gospel, and firm a reliance on it, as if she had been a disciple of Christ for half a century. Yet there was no boasting or presumption—all was humility, resignation and confidence. She called her husband and charged him to educate their daughter in the fear of God; and above all to keep from her those novels and books of infidel sensuality, by which she had been so nearly ruined; and on the evening of the same day, expired in fulness of joy, and peace in believing.

"The account which the Doctor received from her attendants was this—that soon after he had left her, she became alarmed respecting the state of her soul—that at one period such was her agony, that although on the Sunday her voice was so feeble that she could scarcely be heard, her cries were distinctly audible from the second story to the cellar of the house, and at length she found peace in believing in Christ as exhibited in the gospel.—Raffle's Lectures HUMILIATION OF THE REDEEMER.—Had the brightest arch-angel been commissioned to come down, with the olive branch of peace in his hand, showing his eternal Maker's readiness to be reconciled, on our bended knees, with tears of joy and a torrent of thankfulness, we ought to have received the transporting news. But when, instead of such an angelic array, he sends his only begotten Son, his Son, beyond all thought illustrious, to make us the gracious overture; sent him from "the habitation of his holiness and glory," to put on the infirmities of mortality, and dwell in a tabernacle of clay; sent him, not merely to make us a transient visit, but abide many years in our inferior and miserable world; sent him, not to exercise dominion over monarchs, but to wear out his life in the ignoble form of a servant; and, at last, to make his exit under the infamous character of a malefactor!—Was ever love like this? Did ever grace stoop so low? Should the sun be shorn of all its radiant honors, and degraded into a clod of the valley; should all the dignitaries of heaven be disclosed from their thrones, and degenerate into insects of a day, great would be the abasement. But nothing to thine. most blessed Jesus; nothing to thine, thou Prince of Peace; when, for us men, and for our salvation, thou didst not abhor the accommodations of a manger; thou didst not decline even the gloomy horrors of the grave."—Hervey.

FOR THE MINISTER.

DOCTRINAL PREACHING.

From the Inaugural Address of Professor Maginnis of the Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution.

It is often asked, does not doctrinal preaching generally prove fatal to the spirit of piety in our churches? As well might it be asked, is not darkness the necessary result of light? When the doctrines of the gospel are properly exhibited, it is always in connection with the duties they are designed to inculcate; and they are thus made to contribute to some great practical end in the Christian life. Doctrinal preaching should always have a practical aim; practical preaching should always proceed from some doctrinal truth; where this is not the case the precepts of the Bible degenerate into mere rules of morality, and its doctrines into mere matters of theory and speculation. The truth of this remark is sufficiently illustrated in the Ecclesiastical history of our own country. At one time, when the doctrines of the Bible were neglected by the New England pulpit, although the most rigid precepts of morality continued to be inculcated, yet piety soon began to languish, morality itself declined, the worst forms of error took possession of the Church, and Socinianism obtained a permanent establishment in the land of the Pilgrims. At a more recent period, a spirit of speculation characterised the ministry; and, instead of preaching the doctrine of the cross, which, through the unseen and inexplicable energy of the Holy Spirit, imparts divine life to the soul, attempts were made to analyze the process of regeneration, and to establish modes of procedure for the sinner, by the adoption of which he might infallibly secure an immediate change of heart. And if sinners were zealously urged to action, it was not so much from a regard to the authority of God, as from a desire to bring to the test of experiment the proposed theory, which promised such important and valuable results. But what was the consequence of such a course? Ministers became adroit metaphysicians—skilful theorists, but the gospel was deprived of its glory, and God of his honor. The powers of man were declared to be, of themselves, competent for all the purposes of a religious life; and the influences of the Holy Spirit were either pronounced unnecessary in order to a new heart, or were made entirely subject to the control of the human will—some even asserting that, as the thunder-cloud can be despoiled of its fearful bolt, by those who understand the laws of electricity; so the influence of the Holy Spirit, might be secured by those who would take advantage of the laws according to which the divine energy operates. In justice, however, to the Evangelical Church, be it said, that even in New England, suspected as she too often is of a lax theology, there stood up a valiant host of sincere lovers of truth, under whose faithful rebuke such errors received an effectual check, and are now beginning to be regarded as exploded delusions. As we are told however that the star of empire rolls westward, the same may be said of the star of error; and whether the baleful luminary is destined to reach us, or how long it may tarry when it arrives at the meridian of New York, who can tell?—Yet, even here error must have its day: and this sacred Institution can be protected from its influence only by the vigilance of our Churches and the prayers of the people of God.

But the inquiry is still urged: May it not at least be the duty of those who are chiefly occupied in promoting revivals of religion, to leave others to explain the doctrines of the Bible, while they employ themselves in practical appeals to the human heart? I answer it ought to be the chief employment of every minister to promote revivals of religion; and I know of no better means for this purpose, than to preach the gospel in all its length and breadth—in all its doctrines and duties.—This is the means which God prescribes—let us not lose confidence in God's plan.—All the devices of human wisdom are doubtful in their tendency, suspicious in their results. Whoever has faithfully preached the gospel, has fulfilled his commission; and may expect the approbation of his Divine Master. It is a dangerous mistake, to suppose that proper instruction respecting the doctrines and ordinances of the gospel will tend to check the progress of a revival. On the contrary, no season is more favorable for such instruction; when the sinner is humbled, and the saint is rejoicing under the operations of the Holy Spirit, then it is, that all are ready to believe what God teaches. Those who have recently experienced a change of heart, are in the very best state to be indoctrinated; truths, which they then receive, will never leave them, but will become incorporated with their Christian experience—will be interlinked with their most tender associations, and with the recollection of seasons and mercies never to be forgotten.

Furthermore; until the doctrines of the Bible are introduced, and the kind of reception they are to meet with ascertained, there can be no satisfactory evidence of a genuine revival of religion. The Holy Spirit will prepare the way for His own truth; but when this is shunned or rejected, then, neither noise nor excitement, the thronged assembly nor the crowded anxious seat, can be relied upon as an evidence of a work of grace.

And if I might be permitted to utter a word of affectionate warning, upon a subject, in reference to which I feel the deepest solicitude, I would say, in the spirit of Christian love, let our Churches beware how they multiply their numbers while they disregard the proper instruction of those whom they receive. The triumph of the gospel does not consist in collecting men into the Church, but in bringing their hearts under the dominion of truth, and securing in their lives the peaceable fruits of righteousness. An increase of numbers may indicate a momentary prosperity, but division and discord must sooner or later reign, where truth and love do not constitute the bond of union.

PREACHING.—There are two errors in preaching, either of which is apt to accompany the other. We refer to the omission of apposite proof of texts, and the want of plainness and clearness. High-sounding words and involved sentences, though they may contain important sentiments, are seldom forcible or impressive. Indeed nothing commands the conscience like "the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth."—Not that sermons should consist of texts strung together without an intention to prove something by them. But the very best sermons abound in Scripture imagery and proof. Even Dr. Mason's great sermon, Messiah's Throne, is more remarkable for a happy reference to scripture than for any one thing besides. We have somewhere met with the following anecdote, which illustrates our meaning:

"A gentlewoman went one day to hear Dr. —— preach, and, as usual, carried a pocket Bible with her, that she might turn to any of the passages the preacher might happen to refer to. But she found that she had no use for her Bible there; and on coming away, said to a friend, "I should have left my Bible at home to-day and brought my dictionary. The doctor does not deal in Scripture, but such learned words and phrases as require the help of an interpreter to render them intelligible."—Watchman of the South.

FOR THE MINISTER'S WIFE.

From the Mother's Journal.

THE PASTOR'S WIFE.

A considerable number of our readers, it is presumed, sustain the relation expressed in the above title. Some of them may have recently entered upon it, and would gladly ascertain the nature and measure of the duties they have undertaken. Much might be said respecting the duty of the pastor's wife to the people of her husband's charge. These it is not our province to consider, except so far as they affect her relations as a wife. Her station does not relieve her from domestic responsibilities; nay, it vastly increases their number and importance. She should not be blamed for devoting to them a large portion of her time, and it will be found that a faithful discharge of them is her most efficient means of public usefulness.

The management of her household requires her constant attention. Except in our cities and largest towns the churches generally furnish their Pastor with only a bare subsistence. His salary is small, and public opinion, doubtless correctly, shuts him out from other means of gain. Nay, he cannot turn even this pittance to the best account. He cannot spend time to watch the market, or in making good bargains, on penalty of being considered worldly minded and secular in his spirit. At the same time, his station involves expenses, not required of others of equal income. He must exercise the duties of hospitality, be forward in plans of benevolence, and have at least a small library of standard religious books. How can he under these circumstances, maintain and educate his family respectably, how can he avoid the embarrassments of debt, unless the most admirable skill preside over his domestic economy? An ability to calculate expenses, a knowledge of housekeeping, and a frugality which allows nothing to be wasted, are indispensable in her whose task it is, from scanty materials to make a respectable and comfortable home. If able to do this, she aids efficiently her husband's spiritual labours. He is free to devote himself to his sacred duties. He enters his study with his mind undistracted by worldly anxieties, and his public labours witness that he has dug deep into the mines of heavenly truth.

But it is not sufficient that the Pastor's home be orderly and well managed, it must be irradiated with intelligence and love. She who presides there needs a vigorous and cultivated mind, and a heart large in its benevolence, capable of sympathy and self-sacrifice. Can she be a help meet for him whose daily life is in the world of thought, whose office it is to bear the tidings of salvation, unless she is able to enter into the spirit of his work, to share his plans, to strengthen his purpose? It must be for the sake of the objects to which he is devoted, that she is willing to lead a toilsome life and hide the perplexities which would naturally seek relief in his assistance. He is sometimes liable to depression of spirits. His responsibility sometimes comes before him with almost a disheartning power. His usefulness, (shall I say it) his means of subsistence depend on the respect and affection of his flock. An unkind remark or cold reception from some member of his flock may send him home wounded to the heart.—Shall he find there a wife who has no sympathy with a susceptible and anxious spirit? Shall he find one ready to take fire at every real or supposed injury?—quick to wrath—eager to resent. Oh let him meet with that tender sympathy which takes at once bitterness from the heart, with that patient, calm and cheerful temper, which divests imaginary evils of their unreal proportions, and communicates its own power of enduring those which are real. But the Pastor needs to find in his wife a faithful counsellor. He cannot make a confident of a member of his church without creating jealousy. He is happy, if his wife's sound judgment and discretion fit her for this office.

But the most important of her duties is the intellectual and moral training of her family. Her husband is much from home, and much in his study. If the mother is wanting in energy, intelligence, and fidelity, the children will suffer the consequences of neglect. Providence does not work miracles to protect the children of the pious, and if they feel not the guiding and restraining influences of a wise parental government, ruin will, as certainly be their portion as it is that of the children of irreligious parents.—Let the wife of the christian minister make it her first object to educate her children. She cannot be called to spend a large portion of her time in visiting, even for strictly religious purposes; if her children meantime must be trusted to the care of hirelings. The good she may accomplish for society cannot counterbalance the injury, of sending forth by and by a family of ignorant, unruly, and vicious young people. It can not equal the benefit of training up sons and daughters fit to impress on it the stamp of her own virtues. The eye of the community is on the Pastor's home. If order, peace, and love, shed their blessed light over it, the character of the principles which render it so amiable, is felt and honored and other's homes will reflect the lovely image.

FOR THE ATHEIST.

AN EXTRACT.—Go out beneath the arching heavens in night's profound gloom, and say if you can, "THERE IS NO GOD!" pronounce that dread blasphemy, and each star above you will reproach you for your unbroken darkness of intellect—every voice that floats upon the night winds will bewail your utter hopelessness and despair! Is there no GOD? Who, then, unrolled that blue scroll, and threw upon its high frontispiece the legible gleamings of immortality? Who fashioned this green earth—with its perpetual rolling waters and its wide expanse of island and main? Who settled the foundations of the mountains? Who paved the heavens with clouds, and attuned amid the banners of storms the voice of thunders, and unchained the lightnings that linger and lurk, and flash in their gloom? Who gave to the eagle a safe eyrie where the tempests dwell and beat strongest, and to the dove a tranquil abode amid the forests that ever echo to the minstrelsy of her moan? Who made THEE, oh Man? with thy perfected elegance of intellect—and of form? Who made the light pleasant to thee, and the darkness a covering and a herald to the first beautiful flashes of the morning? Who gave thee that matchless symmetry of sinew and limb? That regular flowing of blood? Those irrepressible and daring passions of ambition, and of love? No God? And yet the thunders of heaven, and the waters of earth are calm? Is there no lightning that heaven is not avenged? Are there no floods, that man is not swept under a deluge? They remain—but the bow of reconciliation hangs out above and beneath them. And it were better that the limitless waters and the strong mountains were convulsed and commingled together—it were better that the very stars were conflagrated by fire, or shrouded in gloom, than that ONE soul should be lost, while Mercy kneels and pleads for it beneath the Altar of intercession!

'The fool hath said in his heart there is no God.'
PSALM. 14TH.

'No God! No God!' The simplest flower
  That on the wild is found,
Shrinks as it drinks its cup of dew,
  And trembles at the sound;
'No God!'—astonished Echo cries
  From out the cavern hoar,
And every wandering bird that flies,
  Reproves the Atheist lore.

The solemn forest lifts its head,
  The Almighty to proclaim,
The brooklet on its crystal urn,
  Doth leap to grave his name.
High swells the deep and vengeful sea,
  Along his billowy track,
And red Vesuvius opens his mouth,
  To hurl the falsehood back.

The palm tree with its princely crest,
  The cocoa's leafy shade,
The bread-fruit, bending to its lord,
  In yon far island glade:
The winged seeds that borne by winds,
  The roving sparrows feed,
The melon on the desert sands,
  Confute the scorner's creed.

'No God!' With indignation high
  The fervent sun is stirred,
And the pale moon turns paler still,
  At such an impious word;
And from their burning thrones, the stars
  Look down with angry eye,
That thus a worm of dust should mock
  Eternal Majesty. L. H. S.

FOR THE IMPENITENT.

"HAVE ME EXCUSED."

This is the plea of a heart unreconciled to God. The invitations of God are pressed on the immediate attention of the sinner. He is invited, admonished, entreated, to accept them. But other things have taken possession of his attention, and he replies, "Have me excused." With this upon his heart, if not on his lips, he goes to his worldly employments.

But what is it sinner, from which you would be excused? You would be excused from duty. Reason tells you it is your duty to love God. Reason tells you it is duty to repent of, and forsake sin. You know the service of God to be reasonable. But strange as is the perversion, you have no heart to duty. You have long been out of the habit of acting from a sense of duty, and have followed inclination. So the first, the ever ready language of your heart is, on the mention of duty, "I pray thee have me excused."

But warning is exchanged for invitation. A banquet is prepared. Rich and costly is the provision. Heaven and earth are laid in requisition, that nothing be wanting to make the feast complete. Now the invitation is, "Come, for all things are ready." What! still repeating the plea, "Have me excused!" And what is the ground of this plea? Other engagements; or to let the language of your hearts speak out plainly, you prefer to be otherwise engaged. An offer has been made you of more value than a world, but you will not accept it.—What a price put into your hands, but you have no heart to it!

And now, behold the degree of madness to which the love and the practice of sin reduce you. Your Maker, your daily Preserver, and greatest Benefactor, reminds you of your duty to him, and you heed it not. He comes to you again and again with offers of mercy, and you pass them by. He offers you free forgiveness of sins that are past, he opens heaven, and invites you to enter, but still your language is, "Have me excused."—Christian Watchman.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

From the London Baptist Magazine.

FRANCIS BAMFIELD.

The learned and excellent Francis Bamfield, A. M., descended from an ancient and respectable family at Poltimore, in Devonshire. From his birth, A. D. 1615 his parents designed him for the ministry of the Gospel, in the established Church, with a view to which, they gave him a liberal and first rate education. At the age of sixteen he entered Wadham college, Oxford, as a commoner; and after pursuing his studies with diligence and success for the space of seven years, took his degree in arts A. D. 1638. On leaving the university, he received Episcopal ordination from Bishop Hall, and soon afterwards was introduced to a living in Dorsetshire worth £100 a year. There he was "instant in season and out of season," to promote the interests of religion and education among his parishioners, distributing Bibles and religious books among the young and ignorant, providing employment for the poor and industrious, and spending the whole of his salary in works of mercy and benevolence.

When the civil war commenced in the reign of Charles I., between the advocates of arbitrary power and the friends of true liberty, Mr. Bamfield was a sincere loyalist and a zealous conformist; as a proof of which he used the book of Common Prayer longer than any other minister in the country. In return for such attachment to "our pure and venerable Church establishment," he was rewarded with a prebend's stall in the cathedral of Exeter, May 15, 1641. Soon after he had taken this step in the ladder of ecclesiastical promotion, the corruptions, abuses, and abominations of the system engaged his attention, unsettled his mind, changed his opinions, and forced him into the ranks of Nonconformity.—Wood, the Oxford historian, insinuates that Baxter gained Bamfield over to the Parliament, and corrupted his principles; however that may be, it is certain he ceased to view the established Church as the conservator either of piety or of freedom; and in the year 1653 took the engagement to be faithful to the government then established without the king or the house of lords.

Sherborne, in the county of Dorset, was at that time without a minister; and the parishioners knowing and appreciating the talents and worth of Mr. Bamfield, sent him an invitation to become their pastor.—At first he refused, but afterwards accepted their invitation, and labored among them with general acceptance till the act of Uniformity came into operation. On that very day he preached his farewell sermon to a numerous and beloved flock, who valued his ministerial and pastoral labors; and ceasing to be a minister of the established Church, he became an advocate and a sufferer for Nonconformity.

In the month following his expulsion he began to preach in his own hired house to all who had courage and resolution to attend; but in the midst of the service he was interrupted by the agents of the bishop, and taken to prison, in company with twenty-five of the principal persons assembled on the occasion. But on the Lord's day Mr. Bamfield preached in the prison yard, and numbers of the towns people assembled in an adjoining yard to hear him. He was at length released, on obtaining sureties for his good behavior and appearance at the next sessions. Afterwards he was confined eight years in Dorchester jail, where he preached to his fellow prisoners with such earnestness and power, that a Church was formed within its walls of those who "had obtained like precious faith with himself;" thereby verifying his own remark, "that whatever way the devil and his instruments take to hinder grace, God will wisely overrule to further it."

In the year 1775 he was set at liberty; but resolving to obey God rather than man, and longing after souls in the bowels of Jesus Christ, he began to do the work of an evangelist in several adjoining counties; for which offence he was apprehended in Wiltshire, and kept in Salisbury jail eighteen weeks. At length he was released from confinement and removed to London, where he spent the remainder of his days. Determined to search after truth as for hidden treasures, and to obey the laws of the New Testament, Mr. Bamfield renounced his former views of baptism, and henceforward united with a section of the Baptist denomination.

In the year 1675, he formed a Church on the principles of the Sabbatarian Baptists, laying down the following rules as the terms of union and fellowship: "We own the Lord Jesus Christ to be the one and only Lord and lawgiver to our souls and consciences; and we own the holy Scriptures of truth as the one and only rule of faith, worship, and life; according to which we are to judge all our cases." If in every age since the time of Christ and his apostles these principles had been understood and recognized by rulers in Church and state, the page of history would not have been stained with the record of popish cruelties or of Protestant persecutions.—Auspicious time! when all shall acknowledge Christ as the Lord of the conscience, and receive the New Testament as "the book of the Church." Mr. Bamfield and his flock assembled for religious worship at Pinner's Hall, Broad street, where the spies and emissaries of persecuting zealots found them out, and caused them no small trouble. On the 17th of February, 1682, when in the very act of worshipping God, a constable, followed by several armed men, rushed into the meeting, and in the King's name ordered Mr. Bamfield to come down from the pulpit. This insolent command he properly despised, and refused to leave the pulpit, unless by force. "I have a warrant from the lord mayor to disturb you," said the constable. "And I have a warrant from Jesus, who is Lord Maximus, to go on," replied Bamfield. However, he and six of his people were taken before the mayor, fined 10 pounds each, and dismissed. On the following Lord's day, they were disturbed in a like manner by the entrance of constables and officers—the carnal weapons of a corrupt Church. On the latter occasion Mr. Bamfield was taken out of the pulpit by force, and conveyed to Newgate. On the 17th of March 1683, he was brought before a jury, who found him guilty by the express command of the judge. Soon afterwards he was called up to receive his sentence, when the recorder declared him out of the King's protection; to remain in prison during his life, or during the King's pleasure; and to forfeit all his goods and chattels.

"The hardships which Mr. Bamfield endured soon brought him to his end. At his last trial he was kept ten hours in the bail-dock, a cold and disagreeable place. But he soon received his discharge, death performing that kind office for him in Newgate, Febuary 16, 1684, to the great grief of his fellow prisoners, and a very numerous acquaintance." T. P.

There are many devices in a man's heart; nevertheless, the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand.—Bible.

From the Christian Index.

PETER NO POPE.

A correspondent, just under the mountains of Habersham, has requested our views, through the Index, on Matt. xvi. 18, 19, namely; And I say also unto thee, that thou art Peter; and upon this rock, I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.

Our Lord had enquired of the disciples, Whom men said he was? And they said, some one thing, and some another; but he said to them, Whom say ye that I am? Simon Peter said (one for all) Thou art the Christ the Son of the living God. On this Jesus pronounced him blessed, because this had been revealed to him of his Father in heaven. And then makes the declaration above. The difficulty here is to determine what Christ meant when he said "upon this rock I will build my church." Some think he meant, Peter, because Peter signifies a stone. But it is pretty certain he did not mean Peter, because this rock does not stand in apposition to Peter, neither in case or gender. It is best to understand it as that Truth, which had been revealed to Peter from the heavenly Father. For the belief of this truth is made in scripture fundamental to salvation, and the grounding principle to church-membership. To show this, though Peter was by interpretation a stone, for his firmness and stabilty, manifested in the prompt manner, in which he made the confession, that Jesus was the Christ, our Lord uses another word (Petra) in a differnt gender and case. He says Thou art Peter—Thou art a firm and bold man, as thy name imports; but upon This Petra—This sacred Truth, which my Father in heaven has revealed to you; I build my church. Though Peter and Petra in general may mean the same thing, yet in the N. T. they signify differently, and in the text above they can not doubtlessly, mean the same thing. Let us examine this thing a little.

Parkhurst in his Greek Lexicon says Petros 1. Homer uses it constantly, I believe, for a large stone, i. e. a piece or fragment of a rock, but such as a strong man might throw. Schrevelius renders it first by Lapis which in English is a stone, a pebble. Thus it appears that Peter signifies a stone, or fragment of a rock not very large. But Petra by the same authors is rendered differently. Schrevelius renders it by Saxum grande. Saxum itself signifies a great stone; but grande gives the idea of greatness or grandeur added to it. Parkhurst to give us the distinctive meaning refers to the places where it is used in the N. T. See Matt. 7. 24, 25, where it is said by Christ, I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock. (Petra.) And it fell not; for it was founded upon a rock, (Petra.) Chap. 27, ver. 51. And the rocks rent, (Petrai.) Also ver. 60. And laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock, (Petra.) Some fell on a rock, (Petra.) 1 Cor. 10, 4. And that rock (Petra) was Christ. These quotations fully sustain the sentiment that Petra means something very different in the N. T. from Petros (Peter) a stone or pebble; and brings us to the very point. And that Petra was Christ.

The thing implied by "keys," is authority, and shows the power given to Peter in common with the other Apostles; for they all shared equally in this authority. See Matt. xviii. 18, where the same grant is made to all, in nearly the same terms. If Peter had been here made head and chief Bishop of all the rest, we should somewhere find it expressed. But the contrary is most positively required of them. See Matt. 20. 25, 28, 23, viii. 11. And in Luke 22. 24—26. There was a strife among the disciples on this very subject; but Christ rebuked them and said, "The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them, &c. But ye shall not be so." If Peter had been previously clothed with the authority of being Chief, he would here have been noticed somewhere in the Acts of the apostles or in the Epistles to the churches. But Paul says of himself, 2 Cor. xi. 5. "I suppose I was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles." Which shows he knew nothing about supremacy among the apostles. If it had been true that our Lord constituted Peter chief bishop he himself would have noticed it in his epistles to the scattered brethren, for whose instruction and comfort he wrote.

But he claims nothing beyond equality. He says in his 1 Epistle, v. 1—3. "The Elders which are among you I exhort, who am also an Elder. Feed the flock of God which is among you—not as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock." Strange language this indeed for a Supreme Bishop, with uncontrolled authority. But let us hear him farther. 2 Epistle, iii. 2, stirring up the brethren by way of remembrance, he says, "That ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Savior."

Thus it most evidently appears the apostles knew of no such grant of power to Peter; but felt they were all brethren, and loved the brotherhood.

The declaration that whatsoever things they should bind on earth, should be bound in heaven, and whatsoever things they loose, should be loosed in heaven, denotes the effect of that inspired authority which was given the apostles to bind up the Testimony and seal the law among the disciples, Isa. viii. 16, and to close up the canon of Scripture. There were many things peculiar to the former dispensation, unnecessary to be bound on the obsrvance of the disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ. These were abolished; and the apostles had the right given them to declare them so. There were many things necessary to be observed by the followers of Christ never before instituted. These they had power to bind on their disciples. And all they did by the Spirit of Christ which was in them, were ratified in heaven.

All this is plain to the N. T. reader, without mentioning particulars or quoting texts. We therefore cheerfully submit it to the consideration of such.

From the New York Evangelist.

"LET GOD BE TRUE, AND EVERY MAN A LIAR."

God is true. To his own word he will adhere. His law will never be changed, to accommodate his friends or his enemies. Better that ten thousand men fail of establishing their claim to perfection, than one jot or tittle of the law should pass away.—The pretensions of men to perfect goodness, have been swept like darkness before the light, when the law of God has been revealed to the soul. "I have seen an end to all perfection; but thy commandment is exceeding broad," is language as true and appropriate now as when it was used by the writer of the 119th Psalm.

The grand reason of the low attainments made in holiness by the mass of Christians, is to be sought in their low apprehensions of the standard of holiness. Wherever the spirituality and extent of the law are realized, self-abasement, dependence upon Christ alone, and anxious supplication for the constant presence of the Holy Spirit, are the natural results. The purifying and elevating influence of this effect of divine truth on the character is manifest to all.

Disastrous then in all its bearings, upon fundamental Christian grace, must be all that instruction which teaches that the common impressions of the church respecting the standard of holiness, are above the truth. The great, glaring, ruinous error lies all on the other side. Such is the insensibility of the impenitent to the spirituality of the divine claims, that it constitutes the fatal barrier to any pungent conviction.

The phraseology of the law assumed and stated by our Lord, is adapted to express the unchangeable nature of its demands. In every case it requires all that we have. It is all the heart, soul, mind, and strength of each, at all times. It presents God as the object of supreme and invarible affection. But who among us as yet has ever applied all his strength for the acquisition of the knowledge of God? Who has yet invariably exerted himself to acquire all possible realization of the being, attributes, name, and worship of the infinite Creator?—the Creator clothed in all the loftiness of his eternal supremacy?—the Creator developed in all the pleroma, the fulness, of his redeeming grace? Who and where is he, that has risen on the radiance of the divine law, and on the vigor of its untiring principles, to all the heights and eminences of spiritual glory which the plan of redemption discloses? Who has ever so stood upon each of all these, and there bowed with all corresponding lowliness of reverence, and there burned with every adequate emotion of praise, and there resolved in every varied form of active service? Who is he, and where, on this side of the grave, that can point to uninterrupted periods of his probation, and say there was no bearing of the divine law upon him, in all those hours, days, weeks, months or years, which was not fully and instantaneously met?

Let young converts shun every possible tendency to lower down the standard of the law. The law is a transcript of God. It is God shining forth upon revolving worlds. The glory of the face of Christ consists in the fulfilled design of the law, as connected with the scheme of salvation. Let the centre sink, and the revolving dependencies sink with it. Then we entreat all new converts, study the glorious, the refulgent, the unchanging, the perfect law of God. Trace its sublime relations to the various parts of the great process of redemption. As one new vision of its moral beauty thrills the soul after another, let the soul ascend. Bring not the standard down. Rise, O ever rise upward still, not fearing that you shall be found above it. Compare your characters with its most exalted demands. Contemplate the sins which seem to be least. Take one, of which you are disposed to say, Is it not a little one? and hold it up in the clear light of divine law. See if then it will seem small. Discern its numerous fibres shooting along over all the constitution of man, and all the framework of living truth. See how, in its almost invisible eye, the aspect of utter depravity, of violent and deadly hostility against all good is formed, and inherently abides. Then bring up another, and another, until the whole heart shall quiver under the unsparing self-examination; until, forsaking all claims of perfect obedience for the past, you shall press onward and upward to the things which remain; fired by a vehement indignation against all sin, and melted, invigorated and environed by the attraction of progressive assimilation to the moral glory of God.

THE CLOSE OF PUBLIC WORSHIP.

It would seem by the conduct of not a few, that this was a very interesting, not to say most desirable event. Some demonstrations of interest in it, are visible during the singing of the last hymn, such as various preliminary preparations for its arrival.—After the hymn, fresh and more numerous indications appear that the approaching event is a joyful one. During the singing the Doxology, there is very visible increase in interest. Hymn books are carefully laid away. One seizes his hat, another, his whip, another his cane. One makes ready the pew door. Another seems measuring the distance between himself and the porch, to see how suddenly and safely he can transfer himself there. And when the final words are pronounced, legions of the smaller fry, and particularly in the galleries, rush as though life depended on the celerity with which an escape could be effected from the house of God. All this is sad to a serious mind. It is irreverent to manifest such haste to leave the sanctuary. "The Lord is in his Holy Temple; let all the earth keep silence before him." A due reverence for Him, would forever prevent the evil of which we are complaining.

The following we give as a kind of wise rebuke, and it is not for want of hearty good will on our part, if it does not do good to delinquents in various quarters. Said a clergyman to one of his congregation, "Deacon ——, you do not believe in the doctrine of the Trinity, do you?" "Why?" asked the surprised officer of the church. "Because," replied the minister, "I often observe, that while the christian doxology is sung, at the close of our service, you are occupied in putting on your cloak and gloves, and getting your hat and walking stick, so as to be ready to go; all of which would seem to indicate that you were not disposed to join in that part of divine service."

We contend for a due reverence for God in every part of the services of his sanctuary. To use any part of the time, when his worship is proceeding, in preparations for leaving the house, shows that a sacred and solemn awe has not been inspired by having been in the holy temple. Such impatient haste as is shown by many, is one part of "that sacrifice of fools" which the Scriptures so pointedly rebuke. Let all things be done decently and in order.—Recorder.

ADORATION OF THE WORD.

Thou art the source and centre of all minds,
Their only point of rest, eternal Word!
From thee departing they are lost, and rove
At random without honor, hope, or peace.
From thee is all that soothes the life of man,
His high endeavor, and his glad success.
His strength to suffer, and his will to serve,
But O, thou bounteous giver of all good,
Thou art of all thy gifts, thy self the crown!
Give what thou canst, without thee we are poor,
And with thee rich, take what thou wilt away.

REVIVALS OF RELIGION.

Extract from Dr. Cogswell's History of Revivals of Religion in the "Harbinger of the Millenium."

Revivals of religion to a greater or less extent have at times prevailed ever since the church has existed. Many and signal instances of them are recorded in the old and New Testaments. God at times remarkably displays his power and grace in building up Zion. This was the case in the days of David and Solomon, Asa and Hezekiah, Josiah and Ezra. In the time of John, the harbinger of Christ, the Spirit was poured out in copious effusions. On the day of Pentecost, by the preaching of the Apostles, attended by the special influences of the Holy Ghost, three thousand were added to the church. Multitudes were converted in Samaria. There were various seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord in the first centuries of the Christian church. The gospel had free course and was glorified. This was also the case in succeeding ages. In the sixteenth century, there were unusual effusions of the Spirit, which attended the labors of the Reformers, in Britain, Germany, Switzerland, Denmark, and Holland. A revival took place in France, about 1550, in the time of those distinguished divines Farrel and Viret. There was an extraordinary revival of religion, in 1625, in Scotland.—Such was the revival in 1628, in Ireland. In the time of the Plague in London, in 1665, multitudes were brought to renounce their enmity to the cross and bow to the sceptre of Jesus. In 1732, and 1733, God was pleased to pour out the Spirit on the people of Saltzburg in Germany. More than twenty thousand were converted from Popish darkness to the pure gospel of Christ, and very many hopefully became the subjects of the grace of God. About this time there were extensive revivals in England, Wales, Scotland and the British Provinces in North America. There was a most powerful revival of religion in the United States, more especially in New England, in the days of Whitfield, the Tennents, Edwards, Brainerd, Wheelock and Bellamy. During this period, twenty-five thousand persons were probably added to the churches. This revival of religion is attested as being a glorious work of the Spirit of God, by one hundred and eleven ministers of the Gospel, most of whom were assembled in Boston, in 1743. About the commencement of the nineteenth century, revivals of religion prevailed in the Carolinas, Georgia, Kentucky, Ohio, Tennessee, Pennsylvania, New-York, New-Jersey, and New-England, especially Connecticut. More than one hundred towns in that state were visited with the effusions of the Holy Ghost. For the last twenty years, there has been a series of revivals throughout the land. During the years 1831 and 1832, probably as many as one hundred thousand souls were converted to Christ. Between three hundred and fifty, and four hundred young men, in our public institutions of learning, were hopefully brought to rejoice in the Savior of sinners. This is the Lord's doing and it is marvelous in our eyes. It is not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit saith the Lord of Hosts. The glorious victories of our King should call forth the devout aspirations of our souls.—These should be declared abroad as memorials of divine grace. The trumpet of praise should sound when the King of Zion cometh in triumph having salvation. It is grace—grace. To God be all the glory.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, April 28, 1840.

DO WE LOVE GOD?

It is of immense importance for us rightly to understand this question, for on it turns the future destinies of our souls. If we do not love God, we lack the essential qualifications of a Christian, and rank with the enemies of Jesus Christ; however conversant we may have been with the theory of religion; and however devoted we may have been in the performance of its external duties, notwithstanding. Though we should understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though we have faith to remove mountains; and should bestow all our goods to feed the poor, and give our bodies to the flames, if we are destitute of the holy principles of Charity—that is, love to God, and its consequent love to man—all our hopes are vain; and we are found,

"Like tinkling brass—an empty sound."

Again. If we do not love God, we not only lack the essential qualification of a Christian, but we live in the constant violation of the first and great command of Jehovah, which says, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength."—Then, as sin is the transgression of the law, all who do not love God are sinners—and God has said the "soul that sinneth it shall die." In vain, therefore, are all our pretensions to religion, and in vain are all our hopes of heaven, if we do not love God. St. Paul says, If any man love not our Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema maranatha, i. e. let him be cursed when the Lord cometh.

The above considerations should lead us to a thorough investigation of the question, Do we love God? We fear that many, in attempting to investigate this point of religious experience, fall into fatal errors.—Such, reasoning from false premises, arrive at false conclusions, by which means they feel a security, the fatal consequences of which they may not be apprized of until awoke from their dreams by the light of eternity. It is not uncommon that we meet with individuals who give no evidence of regenerating grace, professing to be lovers of God. The honesty of such professions we will not now question; but we do suppose they may be candid who make them, and yet be destitute of the holy principles they suppose themselves to possess.

In our attempts to decide this question, it is important that we have a correct knowledge of the character of God. If we know nothing of his character, it is impossible for us to love him. If our views of his character are erroneous, it is equally impossible. Why? Because he is not the Being we suppose him to be. We have in our imagination a being that we love. This being is not God, but in many respects the reverse of his character.

To love God, we must love him for his moral as well as for his natural perfections. To be delighted with his natural perfections, and at the same time to be displeased and offended with his moral attributes, amounts to nothing less than hating God.—On this ground it is to be feared that many, very many have erred. A lecturer on Astronomy, while expatiating upon the wisdom and power of God as displayed in the skillful and harmonions arrangement of the heavenly bodies, was apparently caught up and his audience with him to a rapturous state of divine adoration; but no sooner was the audience dismissed and he had left the house, than he was known to treat with contempt the name of that Being he had so lately extolled. This man was delighted with the natural perfections of God, but had no feelings in unison with his moral perfections. Many such have supposed, because they could approve and applaud the divine perfections as exhibited in creation, that they are entitled to the character and blessings of those that love God, notwithstanding his law, the transcript of his moral character, is by them despised and trampled upon. If the law of God is a transcript of his moral image, is it not evidently impossible for us to love God and at the same time despise his holy law? and is it possible for us to be delighted with the principles of his law and voluntarily transgress the law? We think it is impossible. The argument, then, runs thus. To love God, we must love him for his moral perfections.—His law is a transcript of his moral perfections, and therefore we must love his law. Then, as none that love his law will transgress it, we are unavoidably brought to this conclusion.—They that love God will keep his commandments.—1 John, v. 3.

The moral perfections of God relate to his holiness. "God is holy," and "the law is holy."—Rom. vii. 12. Then to love God, and to obey his commandments, requires a holy principle to be implanted within us; and as all men in their unregenerated state are carnally minded, and as the carnal mind is at enmity against God, to love God we must be regenerated—created anew in Christ Jesus unto good works.

Reader, how is it with thee? Art thou aspiring after holiness? and is the law of the Lord made the delight of thy soul?—If so, then thy heart is changed, and thou hast passed from death unto life. But if thy soul is not reaching out after holiness, and the law of the Lord is regarded by thee as a burden too grievous to be borne, whatever may be thy thoughts concerning thyself, thou art at enmity with God, and contesting with him the right of Government. Canst thou do this and love God? Thy reason tells thee no. Then think not, because thou seest some things in the works and providences of God that benefit and please thee, that thou dost love God.—But let a sense of his goodness lead thee to repentance. Seek to have the enmity of thy heart slain, and the holy principles of love and submission established in thy soul. Then thou wilt be ready to give to every one that asketh the reason of the hope that is within thee.

REPENTANCE.

"Repent! the voice celestial cries,
Nor longer dare delay."

Repent said John the Baptist to the inhabitants of Jerusalem and Judea, and the region round about Jordan. Repent said Peter to the thousands assembled on the day of pentecost.—and Paul standing in the midst of Mars Hill proclaimed to the world this solemn charge, God now commandeth all men every where to Repent. For this end Christ hath suffered and rose again from the dead, that Repentance and remission of sins might be preached among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem.

Repent or perish is the doctrine of Christ, and the only alternative of every human being. Reader which wilt thou do? wilt thou Repent, or wilt thou perish?

"Thou must either break or bow."

Christ has decreed that to be saved we must Repent. And if Christ does not save us, to whom shall we go? Salvation from sin, from any other source is impossible.—Repentance or ruin forever is spread out on every page of holy writ, containing the blessed proffers of life and salvation. Reader the case is now before thee, what hast thou to say to it! Art thou not disposed to repent? this is thy sin—the workings of a carnal mind that is at enmity with God—a sin that contemns his authority and tramples upon the just mandates of heaven, and will prove thy everlasting ruin unless thou Repent. Hast thou felt it thy duty to repent? and hast thou delayed the work? This delay proves the perverseness of thy will and the alienation of thy affections from God. This conviction of duty neglected, heightens thy guilt, and a continuation in this neglect will render the salvation of thy soul impossible, and bring down upon thy deathless spirit the everlasting displeasure of an offended and long-neglected God, while around thy guilty soul will be eternally thundered this cutting truth,

"Ye knew your duty but ye did it not."

But dost thou think thou hast repented? If so what has been the nature of that repentance? Hast thou brought forth works meet for repentance? and art thou now walking in newness of life? or art thou still indulging in sin, and finding pleasure in unrighteousness? If so, thou art as destitute of the true spirit of repentance as matter is of thought,—thou art yet in thy sins.

But dost thou say thou hast felt sorrowful in view of thy sins? If this be thy case, what has been the extent of that sorrow? Has it been deep and pungent? Has the very foundation of thy heart been broken up? And has it begat in thee hatred to sin, and a desire for holiness? Or has it been only a superficial emotion of thy soul, which has lasted but for an hour, a day, or a week, and thou hast returned to thy sins "like a dog to his vomiting," or as a "sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire?" If so, thy repentance is not unto life, but unto death.

A person under the exercise of Godly sorrow for sin looks upon it as the abominable thing that God hates. He sees how unjust and ungrateful he has been in disobeying the voice of his Creator, and resolves to mend his ways and seek after righteousness and true holiness. He now looks upon sin to be exceeding sinful, which makes him feel exceeding guilty, and finding nothing in his possession wherewith to make restitution, sinks low in the dust before the throne of grace, and cries, "Lord save or I perish!" The Lord hears and forgives, and the soul awakes to newness of life.

To feel a Godly sorrow for sin we must see it in its nature and tendencies—in its nature, wrong, denying God his right to reign; and tending to subvert his throne, and to spread anarchy and ruin throughout his dominion. Sin questions the authority of God, and its votaries are saying, who is the Almighty that we should serve him?—Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways. Is it not wrong thus to treat the author of our being, the Supreme source of blessing and goodness to us? and canst thou think of having indulged in all this wrong—this wickedness, and remain impenitent? The avenger of blood is at thy heels. Justice demands thy life—thou hast forfeited it. Thy indignity to thy Creator, thy ungratefulness to thy Heavenly Father, has ruined thy soul. O pause and reflect! Canst thou look eternal death in the face, and trample upon God's holy law, and thus bare thy naked soul to the sword of divine vengeance? Flee, O! Flee for thy life; but not from the presence of God. This you cannot do. But repent and turn to God with all thy heart, for he hath found a ransom for thee. Jesus Christ hath made propitiation for thy sins at the expense of great suffering. Think of his humiliation. He that was rich, for our sakes became poor. Look at him in the stable—in the garden—and on the cross, and then say if thou canst slight him by turning a deaf ear to his calls. Say, wilt thou reject him? He died for thee. By him a way of reconciliation is opened, and God is now waiting to be gracious. The sword of divine wrath is now staid in the hand of Christ to give thee an opportunity to repent, and make thy peace with God. Art thou still impenitent? Then thou hast not only trampled upon God's holy law, but thou hast trodden under foot the blood of the Son of God. The authority of God has not only been rejected, but his merciful intentions to save thy soul thou hast slighted, while to God and his Christ thou art saying, "What have I to do with thee?" O how thy case darkens! what an amount of guilt clusters around thy soul, while the arrows of divine vengeance are held back to give thee an opportunity to become reconciled to God!

God, in the person of the Holy Spirit, has come down to assist thee in thy return to him, by giving thee to understand thy ways, and to afford thee all needful aid, so that nothing on his part should be wanting to effect a reconciliation between thee and thy injured Maker. Not that God would be the more happy by it, but that thy soul may be saved. But thou hast disdained all participation in its blessed influence, and thus far steadfastly resisted its strivings, which, if continued in, will seal thy everlasting ruin.

The claims of justice, and the calls of mercy, have alike by thee been neglected. God commands you, and you will not obey him. He sent his Son into the world to redeem you, and you will not come to him that you may be saved. He sent his Holy Spirit into the world to reprove you, and you will not listen to his voice. God delays his wrath, and you delay repenting. He threatens you and you are not concerned. What evidences of awful hostility to God thy Creator! and yet his vengeance waits! What sayest thou impenitent sinner? Hast thou no cause to repent, and will you yet delay? "Now is the accepted time, and now is the day of salvation." But do you say that you cannot repent until God makes you feel that you ought to repent? Do you want greater evidences to convince you that you ought to repent than are already before you? are not the above reasons enough to break your heart? Or are you resolved to stand out to the last, and yield only to irresistible force? O! think of the stubbornness of thy soul.

God says repent now; you say, you can not untill He makes you. Look at thy heart, and say what thou wilt do. Wilt thou repent? Cast a thought after thy future prospects, overhung as they are with eternal gloom, and bring to thy imagination what will ere long prove to be real unless thou repent. Imagine thyself condemned before the judgment seat, and thy soul in endless ruin. Think what thou hast done, and what will become of thee, and then say if thou wilt not repent now, to-morrow may be too late.

"Repent! the voice celestial cries,
Nor longer dare delay;
The wretch, that scorns the mandate, dies,
And meets a fiery day."

ON GIVING OFFENSE.

A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city.—Prov. xviii. 17.

There is no evil among Christians that should be more strenuously guarded against than that of giving offense to a brother; for no evil is attended with more serious consequences to the peace and prosperity of the christian church than this. Among the causes of offenses which are given and received, that of evil speaking is the most prominent. In nineteen cases out of twenty of the offences received, the cause may be traced to this fruitful source of discord in the church and in the world. In many instances offenses are given by injudicious remarks where no unkind feelings exist, and without any design to detract any thing from the moral or religious character of the brother. We cannot therefore be too cautious in what we say when speaking of the character of our brother. All kinds of remarks which would be calculated to detract from the intellectual, moral or religious character of our brother, will most likely be attributed by him to unkind feelings in the person who made them. In this way the seeds of discord are sown, which spring up, and, fructified by the corruptions of our nature, soon yield a bountiful crop of jealousies, evil surmisings, and the brother finally settles into a state of disaffection and hardness which will require great efforts to remove. An incautious and uncharitable remark, or an ungenerous and unbrotherly act, may so impair our brother's confidence, and so fix his prejudice against us as seriously to mar the union that has hitherto existed between us; and when disunion is sown in the heart it will be found very difficult to remove it. The grace of God alone can effect a full and complete restitution to former fellowship.— Let us not therefore think that an injury inflicted on our brother's feelings will be attended with trifling consequences.

REVIVAL RECORD.

THE GREAT REVIVAL IN NORTH INDIA.

It will be recollected, that some months ago, we gave the intelligence of a most remarkable religious movement in India, several thousands of the heathen having renounced their idolatry and united with the church of Christ. The Bishop of Calcutta visited the region refered to, after sufficient time had elapsed, to test, to a considerable extent, the real character of the work. He has communicated the result of his observations to the Church Missionary Society, and we condense the following particulars from the extended report in the London Missionary Register. They will be perused with intense interest.

The work has been in progress two years. Since the former accounts, seventeen new villages have welcomed the Christian teachers. There are now 4,000 people asking the way to Zion. Between 1,000 and 1100 have been baptized. No limit appears to the flowing tide—the current widens and deepens daily.

Seven Gooroos, or heathen leaders and teachers, had renounced Hindooism, and were receiving Christian instruction.— They lose a large income and the obedience of 8,000 or 9,000 disciples. They gain nothing but Christ. Few relapses have taken place; few instances of gross misconduct have occured; there is an evident improvement in morals, family order, and in the daily duties of life; messengers were coming from 40 to 60 miles' distance to beg for instruction; ten chapels had been built of mud and bamboo; and every thing promised well for the permanency of the work.

The Bishop arrived at Kishnagur, the 19th of October, 1839, and on the 21st confirmed about 40. The scene is described as deeply interesting. On the 22d he proceeded to Solo, 22 miles, preached and confirmed 27. Thence he journeyed to Ruttenpore, and preached to a great crowd, and after a careful and satisfactory examination he laid his hands on 100. These services were held in a settlement called Anunda Bas, or the "village of joy," from its delightful situation.—N. Y. Observer.

INTELLIGENCE.

From the Providence Herald.

THE DISASTER AT JOHSNTON.

The information we were able to collect in season for last evening's paper, was as accurate as might have been expected, under the circumstances of confusion and distress, in the midst of which it was collected. In a few particulars, we were not exactly correct, as will be seen.

With many hundreds of our fellow citizens, we went out yesterday to the scene of disaster, to witness the ravages that had been made; and much as we had learned beforehand we were astonished on reaching the spot.

The first thing that struck the eye, was the area which but a few hours before, had been covered with dwellings, and other buildings, except such parts as were used as yards and gardens. But now what a change! Not even the wreck of a building was to be seen on a vast proportion of it, while, in the distance, were the shattered remains of a dwelling-house, a factory, and one or two other mutilated and ruined fabrics, while the whole extent of earth, consisting of a large number of acres, was completely hidden by a continuous bed of rocks, which appeared as though they had been planted there at the creation, and which a mighty river had laved in its course for ages, till instantly diverted from its rocky channel, by some violent convulsion of nature. Never have we seen before, such evidence of the mighty force of water.

The first reservoir which gave way, we understood, was about or nearly half a mile above the village. It came down with dreadful impetuosity, and took the second in its course. The immense bodies of water, thus united, tumbled with overwhelming momentum down the declivity, and, to the depth of at least fifteen feet, swept like an avalanche through the valley with resistless force, and bearing onward in its course all that came in its way. The scene must have been awful in the extreme. A rumble, as of distant thunder—a rushing of the waters—the dashing of the cataract—a brief moment—and the work was over! So sudden was the crash, that even persons in their dwellings, warned of their danger on its first appearance, had not time to escape.

We saw, deposited in one room, no less than fourteen dead bodies which had been collected; and there were two others, at other places, making sixteen in all. It was an awful sight, that will long pain the memory of those who witnessed it. Almost entire families were thus swept away, and involved in indiscriminate destruction.

If ever we experienced the effects of human sympathy for the sufferings of a fellow being, it was while conversing with Mr. Russell B. Whitmore. His father was absent at the time of the calamity. But his wife, his mother, four sisters, and his brother's wife and child, were all involved in one common dreadful fate, and his brother lay dreadfully wounded and in a precarious condition.

From the Providence Journal.

The following are the names of the sufferers:

Franklin Randall, aged two and a half years, son of Benjamin Randall.

Mr. Philip Angel and his wife.

Mrs. Sarah Rogers, wife of Abner Rogers.

Mr. Oliver Angell, aged 18 years.

Emily Ann Angell, aged 6 years, and Benjamin Angell, aged 4 years—children of Mr. Philip Angell.

Mr. John W. Hull, aged 31 years.

Mrs. Lucinda Hull, aged 28 years.

Mr. William McAnsled, aged 26 years.

Mrs. Matilda Whitmore, aged 46 years

Miss Maloney Whitmore, aged 14 years.

Miss Almira Whitmore, aged 12 years.

Miss Julia Ann Whitmore, aged 10 years.

Miss Laurana J. Whitmore, aged 7 years.

The above are the family of Mr. Brayton Whitmore, who is absent on a visit to Connecticut.

Mrs. Martha Whitmore, aged 20 years, wife of Mr. Russell Whitmore.

Jenetta Whitmore, daughter of the above aged 8 months.

The bodies have all been recovered, many of them much mutilated.

The rest of Mr. Randall's family were saved by taking refuge in the upper part of the house, by the timely warning of Mr. Randall, who standing without, saw the rolling tide advancing in time to give them notice of its approach. Up to this morning according to the coroner's report, 16 had been found. Two were still missing—viz: Julia Ann Whitmore and Benjamin Angell. (since found.) The widow Eddy was carried down stream by the torrent, a distance of about half a mile. She succeeded in her efforts to swim ashore, and was found covered up with leaves. Though of course much exhausted she is likely to recover.

Accident.—Mr. Vaughn, of the firm of Read & Vaughn, brewers, of this city, was thrown from his wagon yesterday, while returning from the scene of disaster at Johnston, and so badly injured by the fall, that his life is despaired of.

P. S.—2 P. M. Mr. Vaughn died about half an hour since.

From the Newark Daily Advertiser.

MR. WEBSTER IN THE SICK CHAMBER.

The Washington papers of Saturday mention the death, at Brown's Hotel, of a young man from Massachusetts, (Nathaniel Ray Thomas, aged 27,) who was taken sick 4 or 5 weeks ago in that city, while on his way to the west. This young gentleman belonged to a family residing near Mr. Webster's farm in Marshfield, and that gentleman's absence from the Senate, for some time past, is attributable to the devotion which he felt it his duty to pay to his sick and dying young friend, at so great a distance from his family, The Madisonian says—

We may be permitted to add that the scenes of this death-bed were of a very affecting character, and we feel that in alluding to them we shall be doing scarcely justice to that great goodness of heart which is only equalled by the universally acknowledged greatness of the intellect of Mr. Webster. Our experience renders doubly poignant those sympathetic emotions which we can neither resist feeling nor expressing, in view of the sufferings of this youth, and the affecting tenderness and devotion of his distinguished friend.

Days and nights, almost without interruption, we are informed by a friend who was frequently present, Mr. Webster hung over his uneasy pillow, and with all the affectionate kindness of a father, soothed his pangs, and quieted the mental excitement with which he was afflicted. He did not stand by to see others attend, but himself engaged in the office of principal nurse, and it was evident that while the disturbed mind of the sufferer was unable to recognise other friends, the kind voice and ministering hand of Mr. Webster were always gratefully recognised by the dying youth; and often an approaching paroxysm of insanity and convulsion was alleviated or prevented by his embracing him, and kissing his burning cheek.

The Governor of Florida, in a message to the Territorial Legislature, introduces the following affecting incident:

"Mr Harlan's dwelling was burned, and his family murdered in the afternoon of the 29th of January last. Mr. H. was absent and an eye-witness gives the following account of the return of the unhappy man, with an armed party, on the day after the occurrence. On arriving at the spot, we found every house reduced to ashes, and at the kitchen door the bones of a human being nearly burnt up; after examining all around, we saw the track of mocassins going and coming the same way. On the trail, not far off, we saw articles of clothing, potatoes and papers dropped; about twenty persons, armed, now arrived from Iola, amongst them Mr. Harlan, who in a wretched state of feeling, proceeded to examine the burnt bones, which he believed to be those of his wife and son, whose knife he found amongst them. One of the company in searching behind the garden, about one hundred yards off, called out, "Come here, Harlan; here is your wife!" Joy immediately sprang to my bosom, and I ran to see the dead come to life, where there was a general rush; but lo! I found Mrs. Harlan lying prostrate on the ground, behind some pine logs, with her throat cut, a ball shot through her arm, one in her back, and a fatal shot in the head, which must have been near, as the ball-patch was sticking in her head. Her youngest son, say 8 years old, lay near her side with his skull fractured by a pine stick which lay near him. He exhibited signs of life, and I had him carried to a shelter, water given him, and his cold feet put in warm water; faint hopes are now entertained of his recovery. Had you witnessed the heartrending sight of Mr. H., embracing his little son, and calling him by his nickname, "Buddy? Buddy? Buddy?" with the solemn sound of parental affection, sunk to the lowest ebb of dejection; and then running to the corpse of his wife, throwing his arms around her crying out, "My wife? My dear wife? Oh! my dear wife?" I know your feelings would have given way as mine did; I had always felt a sympathy for these merciless savages, but my heart now assumed a stern fortitude, foreign to its nature, and I felt like not leaving an Indian foot to mark a track in the ashes of the desolation they have made."

SUMMARY.

Accident.—On the 16th inst. while the steamboat Swallow was on her passage to New York City, Jonathan Jurden, an Indian of the Oneida delegation to wait upon the President of the United States, fell overbeard and was drowned.

Thirty-two Physicians of St Clairsville, La., and its vicinity, have threatened to refuse medical attendance to any one who shall support the Bill before the Legislature of that State, making disinterment of dead bodies for dissection, a State Prison offense.

North Western Border.—Two letters from Fort Leavenworth received at the office of the St. Louis Republican, brings intelligence of fresh disturbances among the Indians, on the north western border. The first, dated 14th of March, represents the Ottowas from the Big Platte, as having crossed into Missouri, in small parties, and forcefully levying contributions from all the whites they met, killing their stock, carrying off Grain, and whatever things they want.

The second letter, dated 21st of March, represents the Ioways as having crossed into the state in a body, all well armed, painted, and supplied with extra moccasins. Their conduct and appearance gave the strongest reasons to believe, that they intended to make war on the whites. The country is represented as being thinly settled, and the inhabitants unable to defend themselves. On the receipt of the first letter, Col. Kearney despatched to their assistance all his disposable force; which only amounted to one hundred dragoons, under the command of Capt. Boone.

The Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate, to whom was referred the several messages of the President, relative to the North Eastern Boundary question, conclude their report as follows:

Whilst the committee can perceive no adequate cause, at the present moment for anticipating hostilities between the two countries, they would not be understood as expressing the opinion that the country should not be prepared for any emergency. The question of peace or war, may, in a great degree depend upon the answer of the British government, now speedily expected.

From Yucatan.—The latest accounts from this quarter represents the Federalists as pushing their efforts against Campeachy with great vigor and success. They had already surrounded the town by sea and by land, and the strongest hopes were entertained that the besieged would rather capitulate than permit the place to be stormed.

At the close of the session of the New Brunswick Legislature, the Lieut. Governor, Sir John Harvey, in his speech on that occasion alluded to the subject of difference with the United States, in the following language:

"The prospect of any further disturbance with the neighborhing States appears to have greatly diminished, if not wholly have vanished in consequence of the prudent course adopted by our more immediate neighbors of Maine, in having placed the conduct of the boundary dispute wholly in the hands of the General Government of the United States—thereby affording to both countries the most satisfactory guarantee that the peace and frienship now happily subsisting between two of the greatest and most enlightened nations of the world, and in the maintenance of which their best interests are acknowledged mutually to consist, will not be suffered to be disturbed or interrupted on light or insufficient grounds.

Small Notes.—The bill which Mr. Bell introduced into the Senate authorizing the Banks to issue four millions of one, two, and three dollar notes for one year, has passed that body. What will be its fate in the House of Representatives we shall not venture to foretell.—Harrisburgh Reporter.

A law for the benefit of Married Women. Among the laws passed at the present session of our Legislature, is the following important one for the benefit of married women:

Married Women.—An act in respect to insurances for lives for the benefit of married women. Passed April 1, 1840.

The People of the State of New York represented in Senate and Assembly do enact as follows:

§1. It shall be lawful for any married woman, by herself and in her name, or in the name of any third person, with his assent, as her trustee, to cause to be insured for her sole use, the life of her husband for any definite period, or for the term of his natural life; and in case of her surviving her husband, the sum or nett amount of the insurance, shall be payable to her, to and for her own use, free from the claims of the representatives of her husband, or any of its creditors; but such exemption shall not apply where the amount of premium annually paid shall exceed three hundred dollars.

§2. In case of the death of the wife, before the decease of her husband, the amount of the insurance may be made payable after her death to her children for their use, and their guardian, if under age.

Illustrations of Prophecy,

BY DAVID CAMPBELL.

No. 9, Washington Street, Boston.

THIS work of above 400 pages 18 mo. just published, embraces many of the views of distinguished writers on the prophecies of Daniel, and John, together with some of no small value found in no other work. It is prepared as the reader will see, with unusual advantages of imparting to the eye the resemblance of the natural emblems used by the prophets. These will interest many of the young, especially to investigate the prophecies, which they have hitherto regarded as a sealed book; and with the geography of the prophecies, and chronological calculations peculiar to this work; it will afford much help to understand these parts of the Bible.— It also shows the erroneous ground of some modern propagators of an old but startling theory that the end of all things is at hand. Should the reader fail to find that fulness desirable, yet from so brief a dissertation, he will find much to gratify and instruct. It is a work demanded by the present exigency of the public mind, and is written with a good spirit, giving sober common sense views on matters of great interest.

The work contains 150 pictorial illustrations colored according to the description of the prophets: price $1,00. An Appendix in form of an Atlas, is prepared to accompany the work, which gives a view of countries, in which predicated events have taken place, and which are to take place; also large diagrams and chronological tables, entirely original in their arrangements. One of these plates, throws the entire chronology of the apocalypse, upon one square, to page with the seals, trumpets, and vials arranged in the most skilful manner exhibiting symmetry and beauty, as well as harmony of numbers.

☞Editors who insert the above notice will be entitled to a copy of the work and atlas, by ordering them from No. 9 Washington street, Boston; 126 Fulton street, New-York.

POETRY.

SPRING.

Hail genial spring! sweet season of delight!
At thy return all nature smiles serene;
Fair blooms the landscape on the ravish'd sight,
And new-born glories heighten ev'ry scene.

Thy gentle zephyrs breathing o'er the floods,
Dissolve the north wind's adamantine chains,
And chase fell winter from our native woods
To Alpine hills, or Zembla's frozen plains!

From yonder grove, where late tempestuous driv'n
Loud howl'd the blast o'er many a leafless spray;
Soft on each whisp'ring gale upborne to heav'n,
In strains melodious swells the grateful lay.

No ruthless gunner, with unpitying eyes,
Now spreads wide havoc thro' the echoing meads,
But free as air each feather'd songster flies,
Where pleasure beckons, or where fancy leads.

Soon as deep-ting'd with streaks of early red,
The blushing east proclaims the approaching dawn,
The skylark, warbling, leaves his grassy bed,
And springs exulting on the wings of morn:

Yes, halcyon spring! thy blessing unconfin'd,
Thro' all creation varied charms impart,
And whispering pleasure to the troubled mind,
Soothe ev'ry pang that rends the drooping heart.

Say, who could view the glorious scenes around,
And not breathe praises to His bounteous hand,
Who scatters plenty o'er the verdant ground,
And pours such blessings on a smiling land!

Whether at eve my wand'ring footsteps tread
Where forests wave in ev'ry gale that blows,
Or where, slow winding thro' the flow'ry mead,
In gentle murmurs soft the streamlet flows.

Parent of good, alike my soul adores
The matchless bounty ev'ry scene displays,
And fir'd with rapture, high exulting soars,
In joyful hymns of gratitude and praise!

THE WIDOW OF NAIN.

Luke vii. 12—15.

Weep not, O mother, sounds of lamentation!
Weep not, O widow, weep not hopelessly;
Strong is his arm, the bringer of salvation,
Strong is the arm of God to succor thee.

Bring forth the cold corpse, slowly, slowly bear him,
Hide his pale features with the sable pall,
Chide not the sad one, wildly weeping near him,
Widow'd and childless, she has lost her all.

Why pauses the mourner? who forbids her weeping?
Who the pomp of sorrow has delayed?
Set down the bier; he is not dead, but sleeping,
Young man arise! he spoke and was obeyed!

Change then, O sad one, grief to exultation,
Worship, and bow before Messiah's knee;
Strong was his arm, the bringer of salvation,
Strong was the arm of God to succor thee.

MISCELLANEOUS.

DO NOT DECEIVE CHILDREN.

Many are unaware of the evil consequences which result from this common practice. A physician once called to extract a tooth from a child; the little child seeing the formidable instruments, and anticipating the pain, was exceedingly frightened, and refused to open his mouth. After much fruitless solicitation, the physician said, "perhaps there is no need of drawing it. Let me rub it a little with my handkerchief, and it may be all that is necessary; it will not hurt you in the least." The boy trusting his word, opened his mouth. The physician, concealing his instrument in his handkerchief, seized hold of his tooth and wrenched it out. The parents highly applauded his artifice. But the man cheated the child. He abused his confidence; and he inflicted an injury upon his moral feelings, not soon to be effaced. Will that physician get his handkerchief into the mouth of that child again? Will he believe what the physician may hereafter say? And when told that it is wicked to say that which is not true, will not the remembrance of the doctor's falsehood be fresh in his mind? And while conscious that his parents approved of the deception, will he not feel it to be right for him to deceive, that he will accomplish his desires? This practice is attended with the most ruinous consequences. It unavoidably teaches the child to despise his parents. After he has detected them in one falsehood, he will not believe them when they speak the truth.—It destroys his tenderness of conscience; and it teaches arts of deception. Why because in one particular instance, the point is gained.

Let compulsion be resorted to, when necessary, but deception never. If a child cannot place implicit confidence in his parent, most assuredly no confidence can be reposed in the child. Is it possible for a mother to practice arts of deception and falsehood; and at the same time her daughter be forming a character of frankness and of truth? Who can for a moment suppose it? We must be what we wish our children to be. They will form their characters from ours.

A mother was once trying to persuade her little son to take some medicine. The medicine was very unpalatable, and she, to induce him to take it, declared it did not taste bad. He did not believe her. He knew, by sad experience, that her word was not to be trusted. A gentleman and friend who was present, took the spoon, and said,

"James, this is medicine, and it tastes very badly. I should not like to take it, but I would if necessary. You have courage enough to swallow something which does not taste good, have you not?"

"Yes," said James, looking a little less sulky. "But it is very bad indeed."

"I know it," said the gentleman, "I presume you never tasted any thing much worse." The gentleman then tasted of the medicine himself, and said "It is really very unpleasant. But now let us see if you have not resolution enough to take it, bad as it is."

The boy hesitatingly took the spoon.

"It is, really, rather bad," said the gentleman, "but the best way is to summon all your resolution, and down with it at once, like a man."

James made in reality, a great effort, for a child, and swallowed the dose. And who will this child most respect, his deceitful mother, or the honest dealing stranger?—And who will he hereafter most readily believe? It ought, however, to be remarked, that had the child been properly governed, he would at once, and without a murmur, have taken what his mother presented. It is certainly, however, a supposable case, that the child might, after all the arguments of the gentleman, still have refused to do his duty. What course should then be pursued? Resort to compulsion, but never to deceit. We cannot deceive our children without seriously injuring them, and destroying our own influence. Frankness and open dealing is the only safe policy in family government, as well as on the wider theatre of life. The underhand arts and cunning manœuvres of the intriguer, are sure, in the end, to promote his overthrow. Be sincere and honest and you are safe. The only sure way of securing beneficial results, is by virtuous and honorable means.—Abbott.

From the New Yorker.

THIERS, THE NEW FRENCH PRIME MINISTER.

This distinguished personage is probably the shrewdest and most expert politician who, since the death of Talleyrand, has participated in the Government of France. He is a native of Marseilles, where his father pursued the humble business of a maker of brogans and a mender of leather harnesses. By some means he obtained at an early age a scholarship in the Lyceum of his native city, where he so distinguished himself by his application and progress as to secure the aid of some influential citizens, who sent him to attend the law lectures of Aix. While there he gave a specimen of that ability for which he has since been eminent, to obtain indirectly such ends as were not accessible by straight-forward efforts. A premium had been offered the faculty for the best eulogium on Vanvenargues, and he resolved to obtain it, and sent his manuscript to the committee. The production was found to be far superior to all its competitors; but, on discovering that it was written by Thiers, the loyal members of the examining committee, rather than award the premium to one who had rendered himself obnoxious by haranguing his comrades against the restoration of the Bourbons, postponed their decision to the following year. At the appointed time, his manuscript appeared again; but in the interval a piece had come from Paris which eclipsed all the others, and to it the premium was eagerly awarded, the humble honor of an accessit being, however, accorded to the composition presented by Thiers.—Great was the disappointment of the academicians when, on unsealing the name of the Parisian victor, it was found to be that of the object of their antipathy, who had caused the work to be copied in another hand, made it travel from Aix to Paris, and from Paris to Aix, and gaining both the prize and the accessit.

Thiers was first introduced to public life by the orator Manuel, who made him one of the editors of the great liberal paper of his day, The Constitutionnel, in which he distinguished himself by the extraordinary vigor and manliness of his writings. While pursuing his editorial career he composed his celebrated History of the French Revolution. In 1828, in conjunction with the well-known Armand Carrel, he established the National, the leading and most celebrated opposition French journal up to the time of the revolution of '30. He took an active part in the overthrow of the Polignac Ministry and of Charles the Tenth; and, on the restoration of order, was made Councillor of State, which station he exchanged in 1831 for that of Minister of the Interior, under Marshal Soult. He filled a variety of Ministerial offices up to the last year, when, on account of some disagreements with his coadjutors, he quit public life, and devoted himself to literature. Like Brougham of England, he has found time to compose many works of the first class in History and Philosophy. His active spirit could ill brook the quiet of a closet life, and on the demolition of the Mole Administration, he entered again into political controversy as a deputy and as a controvertist in the journals; and we see by the papers brought by the packet of the 6th of March from London, that he is now Prime Minister of France. Thiers has been most fortunate in all his efforts. He married a woman of great beauty and much greater wealth, and he has elevated the other members of his family to respectable stations in society.

Like Mirabeau, we believe Thiers can boast of being one of the ugliest men of his time. He is small, thin and "rudely shaped, wanting love's majesty;" but in conversation and in forensic debate he is animated and forceful in a remarkable degree. He is now about forty-three years old; and having been a disciple of one of the strictest sects of dietetic philosophy, he retains the flush and vigor of earlier manhood.

When Oliver Cromwell entered upon the command of the Parliament's army against Charles I. he ordered all his soldiers to carry a Bible in their pockets; (the same which is now called Field's.) Among the rest there was a wicked, wild young fellow, who ran away from his apprenticeship in London, for the sake of plunder and dissipation. This fellow was obliged to follow the fashion. Being one day ordered out upon a skirmishing party, or to attack some fortress, he returned to his quarters in the evening unhurt. When he was going to bed, pulling the Bible out of his pocket, he observed a hole in it. His curiosity led him to trace the depth of the hole in his Bible. He found the bullet had gone as far as the xi. chapter of Ecclesiastics, 9th verse. He read the verse, "Rejoice O young man in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." The words were sent home upon his heart by the Divine Spirit, so that he became a very serious and sound believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, and lived in London many years after the civil wars were over. He used pleasantly to observe to Dr. Evans, author of the Christian Temper, that the Bible was the means of saving his soul and body too.

Imagine an aged oak rearing its exposed head alone on a barren hill—the rough blast whistles through its worn out limbs; the battering hail beats forcefully against its side; long it has braved the raging elements: long magnanimously withstood their fury!—but its strength now fails—exhausted and fatigued, with no friendly wood in part to screen it from the assailing storm—it groans a while beneath its fury, until at length, its body and its branches are severed and dispersed by the all-sweeping power of Heaven's electric ball. So is it with friendless Man—the darkly rolling waves of adversity incessantly rush against him—the clouds, as bleak and rough roll along the sky of sorrow, emit their sulphurous flames on his devoted head; amazed he stands!—no friendly arm appears to rescue him from the roaring cataract of ruin—prone falls the wretched creature, and sinks amidst the whirling waves, to rise no more.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

MY NATIVE VILLAGE.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

Sweetly wild, sweetly wild,
Were the scenes that charm'd me when a child,
Rocks, grey rocks, with their caverns dark,
Leaping rills, like the diamond spark,
Torrent voices, thundering by,
When the pride of the vernal woods swelled high,
And quiet roofs, like the hanging nest,
'Mid cliffs, by the feathery foliage dressed.

Beyond, in those woods, did the wild-rose grow,
And the lily gleam out where the lakelets flow,
And the trailing arbutus shroud its grace,
Till its fragrance betray'd its hiding-place,
And the woodbine hold to the dew its cup,
And the vine, with its clustering grapes go up,
Up to the crest of the tallest trees,
And there, with the humming-birds and bees,
On a seat of turf, embroidered fair,
With the violet blue and the columbine rare,
It was sweet to sit, till the sun threw down,
At the gate of the west, his golden crown;
Sweetly wild, sweetly wild,
Were the scenes that charm'd me, when a child.

THE SHABBY SCHOOL GIRL.

"Mamma," said Emma Jones as she untied her neat shaker, "we had a new scholar to-day, the most forlorn looking thing you ever saw. She had on an old calico frock with the color all faded out, and washed ribbon on her hat, and heavy shoes, and all her books covered with colored muslin—she'll be laughed at if she comes to school in that style, I can tell her!"

"Never, I hope, by you Emma!" said her mother. "Poor little girl; to find herself ragged and dirty among strangers!"

"O no, mother, she wasn't ragged and dirty; but very clean; and I remember her clothes such as they were, seemed very neatly put on, not 'pitched' on, as we girls say"

"We girls," said her mother kindly, "are not very select in our expressions, I'm afraid. You have quite interested me, however, in behalf of this poor child. What do you suppose is the cause of her being so shabbily dressed?'

"O I dare say it is because she is poor; of course she would not look so forlorn if she could help it."

"Then you do not think her to blame for being poor."

"O surely not mother! how could I? but I think she might go to the district school where other poor children go."

"Very likely, my dear, it would be more pleasant for her to go there; that is not your affair, nor mine. The only question is, how is it proper for you to treat her while she is at school; having too, as she undoubtedly has an equal right to be there.—If she is not to blame for being poor, of course she ought not to be punished for it; and no punishment is more severe to a child as you well know, than to be mocked or ridiculed."

"O, indeed, I know it mamma!—When the girls only laugh at my red hair, it vexes me dreadfully: I'm sorry I behaved so badly to-day, I forgot my red head when I did it."

"Another thing you forgot, my little Emma. Who is it that dispenses wealth to some, and withholds it from others? that orders and arranges every little circumstance of our lives? Always remember that to reproach or ridicule a person on account of the lot which our Creator has appointed them, is nothing less than to offer a direct affront to God himself. One more reason I can think of, my daughter, why your conduct was wrong, perhaps you can imagine it yourself?"

Emma raised her expressive eyes to her mother's countenance, with a look half subdued, half curious: "No mamma, you have thought of more reasons than I could in a month! I don't think there can be another."

"This little girl, Emma," said her mother, "may be trying to obtain an education in order to support herself by teaching when she grows up, and there may be some reason why it is desirable for her to attend this particular school, now suppose the unkindness she meets with there should make her unhappy, and prevent her receiving any benefit—what would you think then?"

"I should think we were all very wicked indeed! I do hope she did not see me laugh—and I really believe I turned up my nose at her once. But I shall never do it again; I will speak to her to-morrow, and ask her if I shall help her with her lesson, or lend her some of my books; and I'll take her for some of my friends, shall I mother?"

"All but the friendship my dear," said Mrs. Jones, amused yet pained at the ease with which the school girl passed from one extreme to another, "all but the friendship; I would not say much about that to-morrow."

"Well at any rate, mother, I won't be rude to her, and if she needs any thing, I'll offer it."

"I had been sitting with Mrs. Jones, who was an old friend, for some time before Emma came in and had listened to the conversation without remark. I now rose to go, and invited Emma to accompany me to the house of a poor woman, who takes in plain work, thinking a sight of her poverty might be beneficial to her. After a short drive, we stopped at a small house occupied by two females, and while making our way up the winding stairs, a sorrowful voice, interrupted by bitter sobs, reached our ears: it seemed to proceed from the very room we were going to.

"Oh mother, don't say any more about it; it breaks my heart to think of it!—This morning I felt so happy and so smart, with my clean frock and my new books; and now it is all over and I don't believe I can ever feel so again. Do let me stay and sew with you or even beg for you, rather than go to school—I don't want to learn mother indeed I don't.

A sweet voice answered, (for the poor do have sweet voices as well as the rich,) "but my dear Ann, I want you to learn—your trials to-day distress me, quite as much as they [illegible] yourself; but now when you have this fine offer of a good education, shall I tell that kind gentleman you are not willing to accept it? Never mind the ill-treatment of your schoolmates; they'll soon be tired of teazing you, and your education may be a support to your poor mother when she is old and sick. To yourself, it will be food and clothes long before that, I hope."

There was no answer but a heavy sigh—and a sigh from the breast of a child is very—very sad.

Little readers, my tale is told. This was the 'new scholar.' Emma recognized her voice—she had a benevolent heart—and the tears which dimmed her eyes seemed a pledge that the 'shabby' one's school sorrows were nearly at an end.

FOR THE FARMER.

"What a means of imparting pleasure is an improved agriculture. How many charming examples present themselves among us of improvements which every eye gazes upon with unmingled delight. Let a man according to his power, take his ten, his twenty, his fifty, his hundred acres. Let him comb the hair, and wash the face of nature. Let him subdue, clear, cultivate, enrich, embellish it. Let him smooth the rough places, and drain the wet, and fill up the sunken and enrich the barren. Let him line its borders and road-sides with ornamental trees, and let him stock every proper part with vines and fruits. Let his fields and meadows wave with their golden harvests, and let his hills be covered with herds rejoicing in the fulness with which his labors, under the blessing of God, have spread their table, and who, when he goes among them, hasten from all sides to meet him, and gratefully recognize in him a friend and benefactor, and lick the hand which is accustomed to feed and fondle them. Here now let us see the neatly painted cottage, with its green shades, its piazzas tresselled with vines, ~~its sides covered with the~~ spreading elm or the flowering acacia, with here and there the beautiful fur, to shade the picture, and the mountain ash showing its rich clusters of crimson fruit among the deep green foliage, and the smooth and verdant lawn stretching its soft and beautiful carpet in the front view; then look again and see the parents at the close of the day, resting from their labors and enjoying the calm evening, with the pledges of mutual and devoted affection rioting before them in all the buoyancy of youthful innocence and delight; and if at such an hour as this, you can hear the hymn grateful of praise rising from this humble abode of peace and love, and its charming notes mingling with the music of the gurgling brook that flows near by, or broken by the occasional shrill and hollow notes of the gentle and fearless birds, which deem themselves loving members of this loving household; if, then, whether traveler or sojourner, your heart is not touched with this charming and not unusual picture of rural felicity, cease to call yourself a man.—If still you sigh for the bustle and the noise and the confinement of the city, with its impure water, and its offensive odors, with its despicable affections, with its heartless formalities, with its violent excitements, with its midnight festivities, with its utter destitution of sympathy, with its low estimate of human life, with its squallid poverty, its multiplied forms of wretchedness and crime, its pride, its vanity, its ambition, its pomp, its servility, then go back to your gilded prison house, and to pleasures, which an uncorrupted and refined taste, accustomed to drink in the free air of heaven, and to appreciate its freshness, its purity, and its salubrity, you will find no occasion to covet or enjoy. The man who, by his cultivation and good husbandry, presents such a picture to the passer by, shall he not be called a benefactor to the community? Has he not done much to improve and bless society by his example? Has he not built a monument to his own honor, more eloquent than the sculptured marble?

THE NEW-YORKER.

THE publishers of the New-Yorker respectfully announce the commencement of a new volume of their journal on the 21st of September being the Eighth of the double Quarto Edition, and completing the Sixth year of its publication in the Folio or common newspaper form.

The New-Yorker is now so widely known as to render superfluous any detailed delineation of its character and objects. Suffice it here that the work is intended to sustain the reputation of a Weekly Literary Journal not inferior in ability and standing to any on either side of the Atlantic. About two thirds of its columns are devoted to the best Original and Selected Literature, comprising Reviews, Essays (Scientific and Literary.) Tales, Poems, choice extracts from New Works, Biographical and Historical Sketches, &c. &c. In this department, Critical Notices of nearly all new publications of interest will be given. The remaining columns will be devoted to a condensed abstract of the Political and General Intelligence of the day, Domestic and Foreign. Under this head the returns of all important Elections throughout the United States will be carefully compiled and compared with those of former Elections, so as to give a clear exhibit of the relative strength of each political party in the several States. All political movements of interest will likewise be briefly and impartially chronicled. In fine, it will be the general aim of this paper to be first useful and instructive, then agreeable and entertaining. The steady support through the last three years of an average of more than 8,000 subscribers warrants the belief that the conduct of the work has not disappointed the hopes of its friends, while it has secured the decided approval of an intelligent public. Such as it has been it will continue to be, with the additional aid already secured in its Editorial department, to which it is hoped that stil further strength will be added by arrangements now in progress. If unwearied exertion and a fixed resolve to spare no labor or expense which may tend to elevate the character of their work can avail any thing, the undersigned are justified in cherishing a confidence that their journal will at any rate maintain the standing it has already attained in the public estimation.

The Empire State.

THE LARGEST NEWSPAPER IN NEW-YORK.

TERMS—Three Dollars per annum, or two copies for Five Dollars.

The publishers of THE EMPIRE STATE, having completed their arrangements for the Enlarged Series of that paper, will issue on Thursday, January 9th, the first number of the largest Newspaper ever published in New York. Having procured new materials wherewith to execute the printing in a style of elegance unsurpassed by any other newspaper—and having also secured such aid in the several departments, local and general, literary and political, of the paper, as to ensure its worth as a valuable FAMILY NEWSPAPER, the publishers offer it with entire confidence to the patronage of an enlightened public, and a full reliance upon their taste and discrimination for support.

We have chosen the title of "The Empire State," as expressive not only of our attachment to the interests of New York, but of the Union; for whatever interests New York, in a great degree, interests the Union—whether in prosperity or in adversity.—And, as the Empire City is the great centre of business and commerce of the country—the point also where Intelligence from the European World is first received, and from which it radiates throughout the Union; so is New York, in many respects, if not in all, the most eligible point for the establishment of a valuable National Newspaper, as the medium through which shall be diffused to the States and Territories of the Republic, the earliest Intelligence, general and political, from every part of the world.

* * * * *

The mammoth size of our paper enabling us to present weekly an amount of matter contained in no other paper—we shall labor to present such a variety, original and selected, as will suit the tastes of all classes. The Politician, the Moralist, the Farmer, the Mechanic, the Merchant, and Professional Man, the Student and the Antiquary, the lover of humor, and such as would unfold a "Map of the Busy World,"—each and all may find amusement and instruction in the ample pages of the Empire State.

Some prominent features will be given to the paper, not found in any other. The utmost pains will be taken to present, at the earliest date, all important intelligence from every State in the Union—to collect and preserve Statistics and Important Facts, civil, political, and miscellaneous—to give full accounts of the proceedings of Congress, and of the Legislatures of the States—the best Speeches of distinguished American Orators and Statesmen—Memoirs of Eminent Men—Original Tales, Essays, and Poetry—Collections in the History and Antiquities of the Country—Improvements in Agriculture, and the Arts—Gems from the Current Literature of the Day—Notices of all New Works worthy of commendation—and Occurrences at Home and Abroad, commercial, monetary, or of whatever nature that can be of interest to the mass of readers throughout the country.

More, perhaps, we need not say—but submit our labors to the candid judgment of the public.

TERMS OF THE EMPIRE STATE.

ENLARGED SERIES.

The paper will be published on a Mammoth folio sheet, on paper of superior quality, and beautiful type.

The price will be $3 per annum—in all cases in advance. Two copies will be sent for $5. No paper sent until the money is received; and no subscriptions received for a less term than six months.

"THE SOUND OF A GOING IN THE TOPS OF THE MULBERRY TREES."

This expression is sometimes used in prayer, with reference to some favorable indications that God has begun to manifest the reviving influences of his Spirit among a people.

Possibly some who hear it, do not understand its origin. This may be learned by turning to II. Sam. v. 24: "And the Philistines came up yet again, and spread themselves in the valley of Rephain. And when David inquired of the Lord, he said thou shalt not go up; but fetch a compass behind them, and come upon them over against the mulberry trees. And let it be, when thou hearest the sound of a going in the tops of the mulberry trees, that then thou shalt bestir thyself; for then shall the Lord go out before thee, to smite the host of the Philistines."

On this passage, Mr. Henry remarks thus:—

"But observe, though God promised to go before them and smite the Philistines, yet David, when he heard the sound of the going, must bestir himself, and be ready to pursue the victory. Note. God's grace must quicken our endeavors."

The contest against the Philistines, is not the point upon which I fix my eye as I quote this passage, but the responsibilities of a people among whom God begins to move by his Spirit, is the idea which I would make prominent. Many churches in our land now rejoice in the full light of revival blessings; others see some favorable indications, and like the disciples when departing from the sepulchre, they have "fear and great joy." Let such keep near the throne of grace. You see what directions God gave David, and the record is, "And David did so, as the Lord had commanded him;" then follows the record of his success.

In behalf of all those churches where there begins to be some awakening, do I solicit the prayers of those favored portions of Zion, where God has, for many months, displayed his renovating grace. Remember, brethren, how you felt when you first ventured to say, 'the Lord has begun a work among us.' Others, in many places, feel as you then did, and they ask your prayers. Do remember them, I entreat you.

De Ruyter, April 24th. J. R. J.

RELIGIOUS.

SENSE OF THE DIVINE OMNIPRESENCE.

A vague and general admission of the doctrine is of little moment. We speak here of a serious and realising sense of it. For want of this just impression, the hypocrite deceives himself with the delusive hope, that the specious appearance by which he imposes upon others, and perhaps also upon himself, will answer a like purpose with his Maker. It is for want of this last impression that wickedness abounds. Where is the profligate, who, when acting in direct violation of the law of God, would not be terrified at the discovery how perfectly he is under the inspection of that great and terrible being? And how salutary would be the apprehension thus excited! How would he tremble at the consequences of appearing in judgment before Him to whom every thought is exposed, and who is marking every deed, for the express purpose of righteous retribution! True, there are many hardened in their vices, many beyond the reach of argument, and capable, as it should seem, of bidding defiance to God who made them. But is there one who could survey what is at this moment immediately, although invisibly, around him, and not recoil at the sight? Is there one who could behold the countenance of the Almighty flashing indignation upon the daring offender, and not shrink, as into the very dust before Him? Take the boldest transgressor who ever blasphemed the name of his Creator, and spurned at the offers of his grace; take him in the full course of his abandoned career, while good men stand appalled, and even bad men are amazed at his wickedness; let him be rioting in all the malignant passions of that spirit of evil who worketh in the children of disobedience; yet if you could give him to see for one moment in what condition he is, with an avenging God by his side, and the vials of His wrath ready to be poured upon his devoted head; yes, even this shameless transgressor would here, in the land of the living, call upon the rocks and mountains to bury him forever from the sight of that tremendous presence! Is the man bold because these things exist not? He is bold only because he sees them not. They are indisputable and awful realities, and will one day burst upon his view in all their accumulated terrors. We affirm not that even this alarm would change the heart; that is the work of the Holy Spirit: but would it not lead the sinner to tremble for his sins? Would he not cry out, what must I do to be saved? And if not absolutely impenitent, would he not consider his ways, and put away the evil of his doings, and listen to the message of salvation?—Who then can state in words too strong the importance of cherishing an abiding sense of the Divine presence? How full of encouragement and consolation to them who fear God! How replete with salutary terror to those who are under the influence of an evil heart!—Rev. Dr. Dealtry.

AN AFFECTING MEETING.

The following simple, yet deeply solemn and instructive incident, well illustrates the nature of the present revival in this city An intelligent, enterprising man in the walks of business, had become inclined by the feelings of his own mind, and without influence from others, to think on eternity, and the truths of religion. He redeemed time from his moments of relaxation, to read the Bible, and its truths often formed the subject of his thoughts. The more he read, the more he saw the majesty and purity of the truth there revealed, the holiness, justice, and terror of the Divine law, and his own guilty, lost state as a sinner. He was thus led to pray to that God who had revealed this truth, but still he was not conscious of any marked change in his own feelings.

At length his attention became peculiarly drawn to the delineation of our Savior's life and character, as presented by the evangelists. He read, and admired the transcendent excellence of that character. It formed the subject of his thoughts. So deep and strong were those feelings that he could hardly help speaking of them to others. He was not conscious of having passed through a season of conviction for sin, the thought had not once entered his mind that he was forgiven of God, he only knew that he admired the character of Christ. He had a strong desire to tell others what a glorious being Christ is. He felt so strong a desire to tell an acquaintance of his the feelings he had on this subject, that he set out to go to his counting-room, to tell him what a discovery he had made of the beauty and excellence of the character of Christ. It occurred to him that his friend would regard this as a singular errand, but on his way, he met the friend whom he sought in the street; and after the customary civilities he observed to him, "I was wishing to tell you how much I have been interested of late in studying the character of Christ. It appears to me I never knew before what a perfect and excellent being he is." "My dear sir," said his friend, "I have just found him to be precious to my soul." They grasped each other's hands, and the scene which followed may be easier imagined than described.

They immediately retired to the counting-room of the latter, and there spent a few happy moments in telling each other their mutual feelings. And they found a wonderful and striking coincidence. Their present feelings, too, were in delightful harmony, and that on a subject in which they had before felt little or no interest.—During this interview, the first individual mentioned, gained evidence of having become a partaker of Christ, and now, together, these two friends, joined to each other by a new tie, 'go on their way rejoicing.' This is a species of revival which the arch enemy can neither counterfeit nor counteract—this is the finger of God.—Boston Watchman.

REMARKABLE ANECDOTE.

The particulars of the following very striking incident were lately told us by a friend, as a fact falling within the range of his personal knowledge, and having the most perfect confidence in his veracity, we scruple not to give it as such to our readers.

In a seaport town on the west coast of England, some years ago, there was notice given of a sermon to be preached on Sunday evening, in a dissenting chapel there. The preacher was a man of great celebrity in his calling; and that circumstance, together with the pious object of the discourse—to enforce the duty of strict observation of the Sabbath—attracted an overflowing audience. After the usual prefatory prayer and hymn of praise, the preacher gave out the text, and was about to proceed, when he suddenly paused, leant his head on the pulpit, and remained silent for a few moments. It was imagined that he had become indisposed; but he soon recovered himself, and addressing the congregation, said, that before entering on his discourse, he begged to narrate to them a short anecdote. "It is now exactly fifteen years," said he, "since I was last within this place of worship; and the occasion was, as many here may remember, the very same as that which has now bro't us together. Among those that came hither that evening, were three young men, who came not only with the intent of insulting and mocking the venerable pastor, but even with stones in their pockets to throw at him as he stood in his pulpit.—Accordingly, they had not listened long to the discourse, when one of them said impatiently, 'why need we listen any longer to the blockhead?—throw!' but the second stopped him, 'let us first see what he makes of this point.' The curiosity of the latter was no sooner satisfied, than he cried, 'ay, confound him, it is only as I expected—throw now!' But here the third interposed, and said it would be better altogether to give up the design which brought them there. At this remark his two associates took offense, and left the church, while he himself remained to the end. Now, mark, my brethren," continued the preacher with much emotion, "what were afterwards the several fates of these young men. The first was hanged many years ago, at Tyburn, for the crime of forgery: the second is now lying under sentence of death for murder in the jail in this city. The third, my brethren"—and the speaker's agitation became excessive, while he paused and wiped the large drops from his brow—"the third, my brethren, is he who is about to address you—listen to him."

ECHO.

I stood on the banks of a swift flowing river,
While I marked its clear current roll speedily past,
It seemed to my fancy for ever repeating—
That the dearest enjoyments of life would not last.
O, tell me, I said, rapid stream of the valley,
That bear'st in thy course the blue waters away;
Can the joys of life's morning awake but to vanish,
Can the feelings of love be all doom'd to decay?
And echo repeated, "All doomed to decay."

Flow on in thy course, rapid stream of the valley;
Since the pleasures of life we so quickly resign,
My heart shall rejoice in the wild scenes of nature,
And friendship's delights, while they yet may be mine.
Must all the sweet charms of mortality perish,
And friendship's endearments—ah, will they not stay?
The simple enchantments of soft blooming nature,
And the pleasures of mind—must they, too, fada away?
And echo slow answered, "They, too, fade away.'

Then where, I exclaimed, is there hope for the mourner—
A balm for his sorrow, a smile for his grief!
If beautiful scenes like the present shall vanish,
Where, where shall we seek for a certain relief?
O fly, said my soul, to the feet of thy Savior;
Believe in His mercy—for pardon now pray!
With him there is fulness of joy and salvation;
Thy gladness shall live and never decay:
And echo said sweetly, "Shall never decay!"

DESIGN OF PROVIDENCE IN SUBJECTING INDIA TO GREAT BRITAIN.

BY THE REV. DR. DUFF.

Whatever the views and conduct of the men of this world may be, we never forget that, as Christians, the Divine injunction laid upon us, to do good to all men as we have opportunity! Here opportunity is made the measure of our expected well-doing. And when or where has an opportunity of doing good to man, in the highest and noblest sense of that expression, ever been presented to any Christian people, similar to that which British Christians now enjoy, in reference to the millions of India? The facilities now afforded in that distant land for the propagation of the gospel truth, on a scale so broad and extensive, have seldom been equaled, never surpassed, in any of the realms of Gentilism. It is this circumstance, which, above all others, ought to determine the sphere, and regulate the amount, of more immediate duty. Look to other heathen nations. Except China, there is none that remotely approximates to India, either in extent of territory, or in denseness of population. But, if China exceed India in both, may it not be thought that it demands the first place in the calculations of the missionary enterprise! Here however, other elements must be taken into our reckoning. Mere magnitude, either as to territory or population is not enough towards the formation of a sound decision; facility of access and liberty of operation must be held among the conclusive and determining elements in solving the problem of duty. Now, it must be confessed, that, notwithstanding certain appearances and over sanguine expectations, China seems, up to the present time, in regard to direct missionary operations, nearly as much shut against us as if encompassed with an unscalable wall of brass. The same may be said of Madagascar and other portions of the earth. It is our duty to watch and pray that all impediments may everywhere be speedily removed; for these heathen lands, as much as any other, are included in the inheritance of the Son. But how different at this moment is the condition of India! There, we are met by no thundering edicts of a Celestial Emperor to scare us away from its shores, no exterminating decrees of a capricious Madagascar savage to expel us from a territory already partially possessed. Every harbor along its extended coast is thrown open for our reception, every province, every city, and every village, to its utmost boundaries, prepared to tolerate, if not to welcome our gospel ministrations. Over the whole of that region of moral darkness, stable and controllable power presides,—and that is the power of a Christian monarchy. There, Christian governors legislate; Christian judges and magistrates decree justice; and Christian captains, wielding the sword of power, guaranty security of person and of property. All, all conspire to open up a free and unfettered course to the herald of the Cross; and serve to throw over him a broad and invulnerable ægis. How are we to interpret the final cause of such a state of things? Surely if ever Jehovah spoke by infallible signs through the leadings of his providence, it is here that he has uttered his voice; and the announcement of the oracle seems to be, "Behold, without any forethought, cost, or trouble, on your part; behold, the key of Asia is placed in your hands. A door, great and effectual, hath been opened there for you; enter ye in and take possession of the land. If India has been allowed to continue for ages the theatre of one of Satan's mightiest triumphs, it is only that in these latter days it may become the theatre of one of his most disastrous defeats. If, in the pride of sinful independence, India has long refused to yield allegiance to Him, who, on Zion's holy hill, has been anointed King and governor of the nations, it is only that (when made captive and willing in the day of his power and merciful visitation,) she may enrich and adorn with more than oriental magnificence the triumphal car of the conquering Immanuel."

FOR THE INFIDEL.

THERE IS A GOD.

A few days since, while sitting at the breakfast table, and the conversation turning on the truth of Christianity, a gentleman present related the following anecdote, the data of which occurred in this city; assuring us, at the same time, that he received the particulars from the gentleman himself.

The gentleman referred to, was at one period of his life a professed infidel. He, however, became united to a lady holding the truths of Christianity to be a revelation from God. Into the minds of his children he endeavored to instil the same damning principles which he entertained; and it is but natural to suppose that the anxious pious feelings of the Christian mother would oppose, as far as possible, the progress of infidelity in the minds of her beloved children. The father went one evening, accompanied by his son, to Tammany Hall, where a meeting of kindred spirits was held, for the purpose of giving practical illustrations of those infidel principles which they openly avowed. The inventions of man were opposed to the works of his Creator; moons and stars were produced by chemical processes, in order to satisfy the deluded minds of the congregated, that there was no absolute necessity for such a Creator as Christians had absurdly been taught to believe in. The meeting broke up and the father and his son were returning homeward, crossing the Park. The night was beautiful; the moon and stars shone with undimmed brilliancy, as if in mockery of the vain attempts of deluded man at imitation. The child observed them and said—"Father, those moons and stars which we have just seen were not so brilliant as these?" "True, my son," replied the father, and proceeded to show to his son the result of proportionate efforts. "But," answered the child, "supposing that similar ones were created, who could place and sustain them there?" This was more than the Atheistical reasoner was prepared to answer.—These two following simple questions staggered the self-complacent man, proceeding, as they did, from an infant mind.—The father returned home an altered man; he is now a faithul member of the body of Christ. Truly, Lord," out of the mouths of babes and sucklings thou hast ordained and perfected praise."—Sabbath School Monitor.

OBSCURE PASSAGES IN THE BIBLE.—A gentleman who visits with great regularity the Philadelphia Penitentiary, the inmates of which his piety prompts him to instruct, had given a Bible to a convict, who would ask him, at each visit, with much shrewdness, some difficult question formed from passages of the sacred volume; each time declaring he would not go on, if this was not explained to him. The gentleman was unable to persuade him that it would be best for him first to dwell upon those passages which he could easily understand, and which plainly applied to his situation. After many fruitless trials to induce the convict to this course, his friendly teacher said —What would you think of a very hungry man, who had not eaten a morsel of food for the last twenty-four hours, and was asked by a charitable man to come in and sit down at a richly covered table, on which were large dishes of choice meat, and also covered ones, the contents of which the hungry man did not know. Instead of satisfying his exhausted body with the former, he raises one cover after another, and insists on finding out what these unknown dishes are composed of. In spite of all the advice of the charitable man to partake first of the more substantial dishes, he dwells with obstinate inquiry on nicer compounds, until overcome with exhaustion, he drops down. What do you think of such a man? "He is a fool," said the convict, "and I will be one no longer. I understand you well."—Dr. Leiber's Essay on Penal Law.

THE INFIDEL IN THE APPREHENSION OF DEATH.—Percy Bysshe Shelly, who glorified in his infidelity and whose unquestionably fine talents were fearfully desecrated, was apparently a person of the most heroic character, and not likely to feel any serious alarm in the hour of danger.—When sailing in Lord Byron's yatch, a storm arose which threatened the destruction of the vessel. Shelly was immediately alarmed—nothing could render him tranquil; he called out in agony for mercy from that very being on whose law he had not only himself trampled, but whose sovereignty over the hearts of others he had sought to overthrow, and whose name he had never mentioned without the most profane ridicule. His terrors are described as fearfully awful. He is not the only infidel, however, whose last hours have been embittered by the near prospect of death. In the season of health and supposed security, the blasphemer may deride the idea of a God, of judgment, and eternity; his feelings will be far different when God causes his waves to go over him and judgment and eternity are at the very door.

Every way of a man is right in his own eyes; but the Lord pondereth the hearts.

To do justice and judgment is more acceptable to the Lord than sacrifice.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

MARIETTE.

Little Maria was very fond of being useful, and if there was any thing to be done in the house, which a child could do, Maria was always the first to offer: I must say this made her rather officious sometimes, and occasionally she was found fault with for interfering in other people's concerns; but upon the whole she was very obliging, and every body was glad at times to accept her services. One evening there came a ring at the bell, and the servant brought in a small parcel, which Maria soon found was a book come from the booksellers: she was not long before she obtained permission to cut the leaves and cover it, but she began to say "Oh what a pretty book! What a beautiful book! I think this book is fit to be read on Sunday! and here is my name in it; no, not my name quite, but one very like it—Mariette,—a story about Mariette." There were many things in that book, which a child like Maria could not understand, but the story of Mariette was about a little girl not a great many years older than herself, and she was much pleased to have it read to her.

Mariette was a shepherdess who lived in a village among the mountains in the South of France; she had never learned to read, and she had no Bible, but she had heard some people who loved Christ speak about Him, and the things which concerned their souls, and she longed to know more. This, however, was very difficult, for Mariette not only had no one to teach her, but her friends did not wish her to learn. How do you think she managed?

While she was taking care of her little lambs among the mountains, she watched the people who passed by. I must tell you it was a very lonely place, where there are very few people, so that I dare say Mariette sometimes only saw two or three all day, and she used to go up to them, and ask them where they came from? Some of the villages belonged to Roman Catholics, who never read their Bibles, the others belonged to Protestants, who were blessed with a good and pious minister, and had been taught to fear and to serve God. If, therefore, the person told her he came from a Roman Catholic village, she let him go away and said nothing, but if he said he came from a Protestant village, she used to keep him, and ask a great many questions about God, and heaven: and many were the pleasant conversations held thus upon the lonely mountain side.

One day when Mariettee was watching as usual, she had the joy of seeing the good minister himself, coming towards her, and you may guess with what delight she ran to meet him, and how gladly she listened to all he said to her. Sometimes when the children came to watch their sheep and goats near her, she used to beg of them to bring their testament, and read to her, and to teach her the verses from the Psalms, and passages from the Bible, which they had learned at the Sunday School. By these means, Mariette, during the summer, learnt a great deal, but at last, winter came, the mountains were covered with snow, the people could not go out of their villages, and Mariette was deprived of all opportunity of seeing her friends: notwithstanding this, she learned to love God more and more, and at last she refused to go to mass. Mass is the religious worship of the Roman Catholics, and as Mariette knew that there were many things in it contrary to the Bible, and displeasing to God, she was resolved not to go: her friends tried to force her, and they used to beat her, and ill-treat her, but she bore it all patiently: they then sent for her father who was very angry with her, and insisted upon knowing how she came to think of these things. She said it was God who had put them into her heart, and she answered him with so much meekness and solemnity, that he did not try to force her any more to do that which she knew to be wrong. But poor Mariette lived with her grandfather and grandmother, and they still continued to be very unkind to her.

Some time after this, when the spring returned, and the people were able to go about as usual, the good minister walking one day down one of the mountain-paths, saw a flock of lambs hastily driven towards him by a young shepherdess; it was Mariette: She told him again and again how happy she was at meeting him: she told him of all she had suffered: "but when I suffer most," she said, "the good God supports me and I fear nothing; they wish to drag me to mass, and because I refuse, they beat me; and when they have beaten me for the name of Jesus Christ, and see that I do not cry, but rejoice in his name, then they become furious, and beat me still more; but were they to kill me, I would not cry, since the good God strengthens me." Now this poor little girl did not know even the letters of the alphabet: all her knowledge was acquired by the instructions which she had begged from others. The good minister comforted, and encouraged her, and afterwards he went to her father, and persuaded him to forbid her friends from ill-treating her any more.

But this was not enough for Mariette; she earnestly longed to go to Church, where she might hear her kind friend preach about Christ, and join his people, in praying to, and praising Him; so she prayed constantly during the week, that God would dispose her father to grant her permission. Her prayers were heard, and the Sunday following, Mariette made her appearance at the Church, a long, long way from her home. But what was that to her? she was only too thankful to be allowed to go.

She was received with great joy, and a poor man who lived there and was related to her, offered to keep her all the winter, if her friends would let her stay and have her taught to read, and instructed more perfectly in the truths of the Gospel. During the winter in that country, the ground is covered with snow so deep, that the people can hardly go out of their houses; and sometimes it is only light for one little half-hour during the day; then during the long evenings they used to learn to read, and to sing hymns, and many other pleasant things, and their good minister used to teach them.

I am sure you will be glad to hear, that Mariette staid there with them, and was allowed to receive instruction and to go to Church: her history reached the ears of some friends at a great distance, who begged her father to allow them to take care of her: to which he consented, and the happy Mariette in the midst of Christian friends, grew up in the knowledge and love of God.

Sometimes on a winter's evening, a group of little listeners is gathered round to hear a pretty story, and when it is finished many a little face looks anxiously up, with the question, "is it true? is it true?" My dear children, this is all true, quite true.—The good minister I have told you of, is gone to his rest in Jesus. Some day I hope to tell you more about him, but Mariette was still alive a few years ago, and still faithful to her trust in Christ.—Dr. Gilly's Life of Felix Neff.

COWPER'S CONVERSION.

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

I cannot recollect that till the month of December, in the 32d year of my life, I had ever any serious impressions of a religious kind, or at all bethought myself of the things of my salvation, except in two or three instances. The first was of so transitory a nature, and passed when I was so very young, that I did not intend what follows for a history of my heart, so far as religion has been its object, I should hardly mention it.

(Here follows a long account of painful exercises and awful temptations, with which he was harrassed; after which he proceeded as follows:)

At length I remember my friend, Martin Madan, and sent for him. I used to think him an enthusiast, but now seem convinced, that if there was any balm in Gilead, he must administer it to me. On former occasions, when my spiritual concerns had at any time occurred to me, I thought likewise on the necessity of repentance. I knew that many persons had spoken of shedding tears for sin; but when I asked myself, whether the time would ever come, when I should weep for mine, it seemed to me that a stone might sooner do it.

Not knowing that Christ was exalted to give repentance, I despaired of ever attaining to it. My friend came to me; we sat on the bed side together, and he began to declare to me the Gospel. He spoke of original sin, and the corruption of every man born into the world, whereby every one is a child of wrath. I perceived something like hope dawn in my heart. This doctrine set me more upon a level with the rest of mankind and made my condition appear less desperate. Next he insisted on the all-atoning efficacy of the blood of Jesus, and his righteousness for our justification. While I heard this part of his discourse, and the Scriptures on which he founded it, my heart began to burn within; my soul was pierced with a sense of my bitter ingratitude to so merciful a Saviour; and those tears which I thought impossible burst forth freely. I saw clearly that my case required such a remedy, and had not the least doubt within me that this was the Gospel of salvation. Lastly he urged the necessity of a lively faith in Jesus Christ; not an assent only of the understanding, but a faith of application, an actual laying hold of it, and embracing it as a salvation wrought out for me personally. Here I failed and deplored my want of such a faith. He told me it was the gift of God which he trusted he would bestow upon me. I could only reply, "I wish he would"—a very irreverent petition—but a very sincere one and such as the blessed God, in his due time, was pleased to answer.

My brother finding that I had received consolation from Mr. Mandan, was very anxious that I should take the earliest opportunity of conversing with him again; and for this purpose pressed me to go to him immediately. I was for putting it off, but my brother seemed impatient of delay, and at length prevailed on me to set out. I mention this to the honor of his candor and humanity, which would suffer no difference of sentiments to interfere. My welfare was his only object, and all prejudice fled before his zeal to procure it.

(After narrating a series of temptations and despairing apprehensions, he thus observes respecting the favored seasons, when by the power of the Spirit of God, divine light broke in his soul.)

But the happy period which was to shake off my fetters, afford me a clear opening of the free mercy of God in Christ Jesus was now arrived. I flung myself into a chair near the window, and seeing a Bible there, ventured once more to apply to it for comfort and instruction. The first verse I saw was the 25th of the 3d of Romans;—"Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past through the forbearance of God." Immediately I received strength to believe, and the full beams of the sun of righteousness shone upon me. I saw the sufficiency of the atonement he had made, my pardon sealed in his blood, and all the fulness and completeness of his justification. In a moment, I believed and received the Gospel. Whatever my friend Mandan had said to me so long before, revived in all its clearness, with demonstration of the Spirit and with power.

Unless the Almighty arm had been under me, I think I should have died with gratitude and joy. My eyes filled with tears, and my voice choked with transport. I could only look up to Heaven in silent fear, overwhelmed with love and wonder. But the work of the Holy Spirit is best described in his own words, it is "joy unspeakable and full of glory." Thus was my Heavenly Father in Christ Jesus pleased to give me the full assurance of Faith; and, out of a stony unbelieving heart, to "raise up a child unto Abraham." How glad should I have been to have spent every moment in prayer and thanksgiving! I lost no opportunity of repairing to the Throne of Grace, but flew to it with an earnestness irresistible and never to be satisfied. Could I do otherwise than love and rejoice in my reconciled Father in Christ Jesus? The Lord had enlarged my heart and "I ran in the way of his commandments."

For many succeeding weeks, tears were ready to flow, if I did but speak of the Gospel, or mention the name of Jesus. To rejoice day and night was all my employment. Too happy to sleep much, I thought it was but lost time that was spent in slumber. Oh! that the ardor of my first love had continued! But I have known many a lifeless and unhallowed hour since; long intervals of darkness, interrupted by short returns of peace and joy in believing.

My physician, ever watchful and apprehensive for my welfare, was now alarmed; lest the sudden transition from despair to joy should terminate in a fatal phrenzy.—But "the Lord was my strength and my song, and was become my salvation." I said, "I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord; he has chastened me sore, but not given me over unto death. O give thanks unto the Lord, for his mercy endureth for ever."

In a short time, Dr. C. became satisfied, and acquiesced in the soundness of my cure; and much sweet communion I had with him, concerning the things of our salvation. He visited me every morning while I staid with him, which was nearly twelve months after my recovery, and the Gospel was the delightful theme of our conversation. No trial has befallen me since, but might be expected in a state of warfare.

* * * * * * *

I went to church for the first time after my recovery. Throughout the whole service I had much to do to restrain my emotions, so fully did I see the beauty and the glory of the Lord. My heart was full of love to all the congregation, especially to them in whom I observed an air of sober attention. A grave and sober person sat in the pew with me; him I have seen and often conversed with, have found him a pious man, and a true servant of the blessed Redeemer. While he was singing the psalm, I looked at him, and observing him intent on his holy employment, I could not help saying in my heart with much emotion, "Bless you for praising him whom my soul loveth!" Such was the goodness of the Lord to me that he gave me "the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness;" and though my voice was silent, being stopped by the intenseness of what I felt, yet my soul sung within me, and even leapt for joy. And when the gospel for the day was read, the sound of it was more than I could well support. Oh what a word is the word of God, when the spirit quickens us to receive it and gives the hearing ear, and the understanding heart? The harmony of heaven is in it, and discovers its author. The parable of the prodigal son was the portion of Scripture. I saw myself in that glass so clearly, and the loving kindness of my slighted and forgotten Lord, that the whole scene was realized to me, and acted over in my heart.

RETIREMENT FROM THE WORLD.

Like sweet music to the ear that is worried with a succession of discords—as retirement to the mind jaded with the tumult and distraction of life—who, that hath gone with his Lord to the desert and to the mountain, would not wish the shades of the evening, and the beams of the morning, again and again to surprise him, in the posture of devout meditation and prayer?—And who, that denies the soul that repose which is as essential to its welfare as air or food to the body, can wonder that it droops and languishes, amidst the ceaseless agitation of the world? Our Lord, though he shrank not from duty, loved retirement. It was there he sought to deepen his communion with God; he went apart to pray. It was thither he invited his disciples "Come into the desert and rest awhile." It was when, in the spirit of their Master, his little flock had closed the doors against the intrusion of the world, that he said to them, "Peace be unto you." Is it then, likely that the retirement so precious to our Lord, and to his first and best followers, should be needless for ourselves? Child of the dust! how canst thou do without that which thy Redeemer so earnestly coveted?—How canst thou hope, in the ceaseless whirl and tumult of thy feverish existence, to find leisure to be good? How can a life of perpetual agitation allow the lessons of truth to fasten on thy mind? Is not this sowing to the whirlwind—and canst thou expect to reap? Learn, thou busy bustler in concerns of little worth, to be quiet. "Commune with thine own heart, and be still." Go apart now, to sit in judgment upon thine own soul, for at the great day thou shalt stand apart to be judged. "My people," it is said, "shall dwell in peaceful habitations, and in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting places." Should we not then cherish here the peaceful graces which may fit us for such a world?—Cunningham.

Praise.—Surely it will mightily exalt our affections, and stir us up to the most vigorous devotion, to consider with whom we bear a part, with angels, and archangels, and all the company of heaven. For Jesus, by his death, united heaven and earth, and designed all his redeemed ones to sing hallelujah with the blest spirits above for ever and ever. Therefore it is fit that we should begin to unite our voices with them, with whom we hope to praise God to all eternity. Only as we sing with them, let us sing like them, and not spoil their blessed harmony by mingling flat and discordant notes. O with what delight and pleasure, sincerity and joy, do they sing their hymns, while they are ravished with the prospect of the Divine perfections? Could we but see their felicity, and hear their music, it would transport us above ourselves, and make us forget and despise all other pleasures, to join with them. It may be, that we fear that we cannot sing in so high a note; yet if we do it with like sincerity, our lower key may grace the harmony, and complete the concord. Behold those blessed spirits who had no need of any Savior, and who never did offend, do praise God with incessant voices for his mercy and love to us, and seem to invite us, saying—"O ye sons of men, praise the Lord with us, and let us magnify his name together."

How, then, can we be silent, especially when our glorified brethren, prophets and apostles, saints and martyrs, do also bear a part in this admirable hymn. How justly do we style the object of these praises a glorious name, since all the world resounds its praise! To it cherubim and seraphim, angels and archangels, continually do cry, Holy, Holy, Holy; and all the saints in heaven and earth do join to set forth the glory thereof.—Dr. Comber on the Trisagium.

A guilty conscience.—Had you all once felt the smart of a galled conscience, you would need no other argument to persuade you to avoid it; for that doubtless is the greatest torment and misery that mankind is capable of, as the wise man observes, saying, the spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity, but a wounded spirit who can bear? No man, certainly, except Almighty God can support him under it, either in judgment to punish him, or else in mercy to bring him to repentance by it.—Ask but such a one, who labors under it, what it is to have a wounded and offended conscience, and he will tell you, that no sorrow is like unto his sorrow, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted him in the day of his anger; the arrows of the Almighty are within him, the poison whereof drinketh up his spirits, the terrors of God set themselves in array against him. O the wormwood and the gall, the anguish and bitterness of the soul!—How doth he fret, and fume, and vex, and tear, and torment himself at the remembrance of his sin and folly! Every thing is uneasy and troublesome to him, yea, he is a burden to himself, he cannot endure himself, but wishes he had never been, or could cease to be: his mind is distracted, his thoughts confounded, his whole soul is overspread with darkness and horror, and tossed to and fro, like a troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waves cast up mire and dirt. Thus is the poor man always upon the rack, distorted, tormented, terrified, and hurried about by his own outraged conscience, as if all the fiends of hell were let loose upon him. What would he now give, or rather what would he not give for a good conscience? If all the crowns and sceptres upon earth were his, he would willingly part with them all upon these terms, and reckon it the best purchase he ever made. Bishop Beveridge.

EXPOSTULATION OF A SINNER.

It was for the sake of sin that the Judge did suffer unspeakable pains, such as were sufficient to reconcile all the world to God. And to consider that thou hast, for thine own particular gratification, made all this in vain and ineffective, that Christ thy Lord and Judge should be tormented for nothing; that thou wouldst not accept felicity and pardon, when he purchased them at so dear a price, it must needs be an infinite condemnation to thee. How shalt thou look upon him that fainted and died for love of thee, and thou didst scorn his miraculous mercies? How shalt thou dare to behold that holy face which brought salvation to thee, and thou didst turn away, and fall in love with death, and deformity, and sin? And yet, in beholding that face consists much of the glories of eternity.—Surely all the pains and the passions, the sorrows and the groans, the humility and poverty, the labors and the watchings, the prayers and the sermons, the miracles and the prophecies, the whip and the nails, the death and the burial, the shame and the smart, the cross and the grave of Jesus, shall be laid upon thy score, if thou hast refused the mercies and design of all their holy ends and purposes. And if thou rememberest what a calamity that was which broke the Jewish nation in pieces, when Christ came to Judge them for their murdering him who was their King, and the Prince of life; and considerest that this was but a dark image of the terrors of the day of judgment, thou mayest then apprehend that there is some strange, unspeakable evil in store for one who refuses the salvation of Jesus, and rather chooses that Satan should rejoice in his destruction, than that Jesus should triumph in his felicity.—Jeremy Taylor.

The thoughts of the diligent tend only to plenteousness; but of every one that is hasty, only to want.

THE PEARL OF GREAT PRICE.

The Lord Jesus in presenting the rich blessings of the Gospel to the consideration of lost sinners, selected, from among the most beautiful and valuable things in Nature, the things most highly esteemed among men, unto which he likened his kingdom, that they might possess the most exalted views of its character of which their capacity would admit. For this purpose, and also to convince men that the blessings of the gospel should outweigh every other consideration, and should be possessed though at the expense of all things else, he gave us the following beautiful simile: "The kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchantman seeking goodly pearls; who, when he had found one of great price, went and sold all that he had and bought it." As this merchantman was seeking goodly pearls, so men are invariably in the pursuit of something by which they hope to allay their thirst for happiness, and acquire ease and quietness of soul.—The language of the unrenewed in heart is, Who will show us any good? To such the gospel is presented as the pearl of great price—as the one thing needful, to possess which we must relinquish every other expectation of happiness, and accept it as our all.

The Gospel is the Pearl of Great Price,

1. Because it is exactly adapted to the wants of the sinner.

The mind of the sinner, restless and unhappy, is ranging over the earth in hopes of lighting on something by which the unsatisfied desires of his soul may be assuaged—something by which lasting pleasures may be secured. But his anxieties and restlessness continue to increase as he progresses, and he finds himself disappointed in his pursuit. That, therefore, which would secure to him present and future happiness, must be a pearl of great price. This pearl is presented to the sinner in the gospel of Jesus Christ.

> Here springs of sacred pleasure rise
> To ease our every pain;
> Immortal fountain full supplies,
> Nor need we thirst again.

The sinner is not only unhappy, but he is polluted. His soul is defiled with sin, the stain of which cannot be washed away by any effort or application we can make, aside from the cleansing efficacy of the blood of Jesus Christ. The foul leprosy must therefore cleave unto us forever in spite of all the remedies that can be furnished us by ourselves, by our friends, or by any creature or material whatever.—The gospel is, therefore, the pearl of great price, as it presents to us a fountain in which we may wash and be clean. "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin."—Thus in whatever light we may look at the sinner's condition, the blessings of the gospel are adapted to his necessities. Is he miserable? the gospel can make him happy. Is he polluted? it can make him clean. Is he under sentence of condemnation? the gospel furnishes pardon. Is he unreconciled to God? it is the grace of reconciliation

2. The gospel is a pearl of great price inasmuch as it is procured at an infinite expense.

Nothing less than the humiliation and death of the Son of God was required to give it existence. He that was rich for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be made rich. At what an expense, then, are we provided with a dispensation of mercy! What estimate shall we put upon the gift, humiliation and sufferings of the Son of God! To use the language of the excellent Hervey: Should the sun be shorn of all its radiant honors, and degraded into a clod of the valley;—should all the dignitaries of Heaven be deposed from their thrones and degraded into insects of a day, great would be their abasement. But nothing to thine, most blessed Jesus, thou Prince of Peace, when for man, and for our salvation, thou didst not abhor the accommodations of a manger. Thou didst not decline even the gloomy horrors of the grave. Surely, this is price beyond all price, which indulgent heaven has poured out to recover wretched guilty man from the effects of the fall, and to bring back the wretched wanderer to the embraces of the divine favor. The gospel, then, is the Pearl of Great Price. To procure it our holy, blessed Redeemer gave his life. Then if we are to measure the excellency of the gospel by its cost, who can properly estimate its value! or what can be put in competition with it! And yet it is neglected by thousands who prefer to wallow in the filthy mire of sin, and to drink at the embittered and unsatisfying fountain of worldly enjoyments, rather than to submit to the requisitions of the gospel and drink in substantial joys at the fountain of life.

Notwithstanding this Pearl is of infinite value, and provided at an infinite expense, yet it is placed in the reach of all who sufficiently desire it. None so poor as to disqualify them to possess it, and none are so rich as to purchase it. But to possess it our hearts must let go every thing else, and we must receive it upon the bended knees of our souls as the free gift of God.

This pearl of great price may be lightly esteemed by men while surrounded with the allurements of the world and thronged with the busy cares of this life; but when forced by death to let go our hold upon sublunary objects, and we are about to face the realities of the invisible world, we shall begin suitably to feel the great importance of being in possession of this treasure; for its benefits are not only enjoyed in this life, but accompanying the believer through the trying scenes of death, extends its blessed fruits to the soul in another world, filling it with the rich enjoyments of heaven forever. Reader, are you in possession of this Pearl?

TIME IS PRECIOUS.

It is remarked that we do not know how to appreciate a blessing until we are about to be deprived of it. This is true in reference to time. While it is lengthened out to us, and there are no evident signs of its discontinuance, our days pass off without any suitable sense of their value. But, when there are strong indications of their speedy close, we are astonished at our former stupidity, and prodigal waste of time. But in health, with the prospect of long life before us, such is usually our stupidity on this subject, that we need to have continually sounded in our ears, and engraved upon the palms of our hands—upon the walls of our dwellings—and upon all that we see and touch, this truth—Time is precious.

It is impossible for us to place too high a value upon our time. Every moment should be considered precious, and should be devoted to the great objects of our being. Had wretched Altamont understood this, he would have been saved the pain which extorted from him this heart chilling confession, "O time it is fit thou shouldst strike thy murderer to the heart!" How many, placing no proper estimate upon their time, have squandered it away in idleness, or what is worse, in rioting upon the luxuries of this life, to the neglect of the solemn duties enjoined upon them by their Creator. Such are murderers of their time and at the last, it will be fit it should strike its murderers to the heart. Many such, appear only to learn that time is precious, when it can no longer be theirs. Then the addition of a single day, or a single hour, would be hailed as a precious boon.

Let us not, then, while days and years are allotted us, be unmindful of their value, but become wise, "redeeming the time," for our days are few, and our accountability great.

Health Journal.—We have received the second No. of the Health Journal and Advocate of Physiological Reform, published weekly at Boston and Worcester, Mass., by Joseph S. Wall. From a hasty perusal of its contents, we think it is a useful publication, and ably conducted.

For the Register.

Messrs. Editors,—When I presented to you the question which you inserted in the third No. of the Register, I little thought that I should be called upon for a solution, supposing that some of your readers would save me the labor. But inasmuch as no solution appears, and you consider me responsible for the promise I made to furnish a solution providing no one else did, I present the following for your inspection, and the inspection of your readers should you choose to insert it in your paper. And I would say, if any one finds an error or errors in the solution, (which I presume they may, as the writer is not infallible) I should be pleased to be corrected.

SOLUTION.

1st. Let s= surface of the earth, S= solidity, b= 3,1416, and D= diameter.—Then s= D sq. X* b (Geometry, Book 8, Prop. 10, Cor.) or s= 8,000 sq. 3,1416 = 201,062,400.

S= s X 1–6 D. (Geom. b. 8, p. 14.)

Or S= 201,062,400 X 1–6 of 8,000 = 268,083,200,000.

Having now found the no. of solid miles the earth contains, we will call it the surface of the hollow globe, because said surface is to be one mile thick.

2d. Having given the surface we will find the diameter of the hollow globe, and since s= D sq. X b by transposing and extracting the square root we have D= square root of s divided by b = sq. r. of 268,083,200,000 div. by 3,1416 = 292,118 miles, now if we subtract 2 from this number we obtain 292,116 for the diameter of hollow globe.

3d. We will now find the number of solid miles in hollow globe, and since solidity equals cube of diameter multiplied by 1–6 b (Geom. B. 8, P. 14, Sch. 3,) we have by logarithms as follows:

log. of 292,116=5,465555
multiplied by 3 = 16,396665
log. of 1–6 b or ,5236 added, —1,719000
log. of no. solid miles is....16,115665
the no. answering to it is 13,051,621,621,621,621.

4th. We will reduce this last number to inches and divide by 35,25, the no. of solid inches in one pint.

log. of 13,051,621,621,- [621,621,=16,115665
log. of sol. in. in a mile,
[or 254,358,061,056,000=14,405415
log. of 35,25 is to be subract-
[ed, which is........1,547159
log. of Ans. is.............28,973951

consequently, the Ans. omitting all decimals is, 94,178,260,869,565,217,391,304,347,826 lbs. or 91 octillions, 178 septillions, 260 sextillions, 869 quintillions, 565 quadrillions, 217 trillions, 391 billions, 301 millions, 347 thousand, 826 lbs.

REVIVAL RECORD.

From the N. Y. Observer.

The rain continues to descend not only upon our city churches, but upon many in the country, refreshing some gently, and more abundantly watering others. So general are these displays of divine grace at the present time, that those churches, where God is not pouring out his Spirit, ought seriously to inquire, why are we passed by. In a time of grievous famine, the Prophet Jeremiah cried, "Oh the hope of Israel, the Savior thereof in time of trouble, why shouldst thou be as a stranger in the land, and as a wayfaring man that turneth aside to tarry for a night." He acknowledges "our iniquities testify against us," and being humbled on account of them, he sought their forgiveness and a return of divine favor. The people of God know full well that a parent is not more willing to give bread to his starving children than our Father in Heaven is to give his Holy Spirit to them that ask him. We know that our iniquities separate between us and our God, and cause him to hide his face from us.—And when we pray, "turn us again, Oh God, and cause thy face to shine, and we shall be saved," we know that God is willing to hear and answer. Let not the thought be cherished by any that God is not ready. He waits to be gracious. He loves to bestow the blessing. Why then does not the rain descend?

Among the places recently, or at present, visited with the converting influence of the Holy Ghost, we observe the names of Portland, Otisville, Whitneyville, Mount Desert, Harpwell and Oxford, in the state of Maine; Norwalk, Stamford, Waterbury and Meriden, in Connecticut, and some of the churches at Rochester, Ogden, Penfield, Holley, Wheatland, Pavilion, Avon, Lakeville, Nunda and Wyoming.

As the fruits of a precious work of grace in Cleaveland Ohio, 50 have united with the Protestant and 50 with the Episcopal Methodist churches; 100 with the Wesleyan Methodist church; 106 with the Baptist church; and about 180 have been examined for admission into the Presbyterian church. They are expected to be admitted next Sabbath; 16 were admitted last January. Total 502.

To the Episcopal church in Willingborough, N. J., 24 were added March 30th. To Christ church, Philadelphia, 46, and to the church of the Epiphany 30 were added on Sunday, the 12th inst.,; to the Swede's church 30, and to the church of the Evangelists 20, on the 16th inst. P.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

From the New Yorker.

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

ENGLAND.

In the House of Commons, March 9th, Mr. J. A. Smith asked what was the object of the Naval and Military preparations now going on in India.

Lord J. Russell answered that they were to obtain reparation for the insults and injuries offered to her Majesty's Superintendent and her Majesty's subjects by the Chinese Government; they were to obtain for the Merchants trading with China an indemnification for the loss of their property, incurred by threats of violence offered by persons under the direction of the Chinese Government; and lastly, they were to obtain a certain security that persons and property in future trading in China should be protected from insult or injury, and that trade and commerce should be maintained upon a proper footing.

In the House of Commons, March 23d, Lord John Russell brought forward a bill for the union of the two Canadas under one Provincial Government. It provides that the United House of Assembly shall consist of 78 members to be elected as at present, but the Representatives are to be in possession of £500 property as a qualification. The house to be elected for four years, as now. The Upper House or Legislative Council, to be appointed for life, as at present. The noble Lord also adverted to the Clergy Reserve Bill, to the abstract question of a Church Establishment, and to the necessity of passing that bill to satisfy the people of Canada. He said the Ministers, if not overruled by Parliament, were prepared to give their assent to the bill.

Petitions for the repeal of the corn laws continued to be presented to Parliament in great numbers.

Lord John Russell has declared that it would be scarcely possible to suppress the traffic in slaves, if the whole British Navy were employed for that purpose.

FRANCE.

The Emperor of Morocco has declared war against the French Government, and that he takes part with Abd-el-Kader. In consequence, orders have been transmitted by the Minister of Marine to Admiral Rosamel, to send a force to the coast of Africa.

The dearth of corn had been nigh occasioning some disturbance at Avranches.—Serious disturbances on account of the dearness of corn had also occurred at Caen.

The correspondent of the London Times, under date of Paris March 23d, says: efforts have been made to induce Count Mole, Marshal Soult, and M. Duchatel to join the late Ministers, but they have not been successful, although each of those three personages and their friends will with heart and hand oppose the present Ministry. Another and still more menacing fact than the continued hostility of M. M. Soult, Mole, and Duchatel, has, however transpired—namely, the reconciliation of the party known as "the 221," and their pledge unanimously to vote against the ministers on the secret service money question.

Hence the very best informed persons, those who twenty-fours since deemed M. Thiers secure of a respectable majority, consider it now questionable that he will have a majority at all. On that division therefore, depends the fate of the ministry, and possibly (some say) that of the existing monarchy. The king is ready and willing to accept the resignation of M. Thiers, and so far advanced is the organization of a new Cabinet, in anticipation of it, that it would be gazetted within twenty-four hours of that event.

SPAIN.

Affairs in Spain are in a very precarious state: there is no money in the Treasury.

The Chamber of Deputies is at last constituted. M. Isturitz has been chosen President by a large majority. The other members of the bureau have been chosen from among the same party. Madrid is tranquil. The intelligence from the provinces is mostly of a satisfactory nature. The state of siege has been raised.

RUSSIA.

The Russian Government has recently sent, as the Sud of Marseilles states, some magnificent presents of ecclesiastical ornaments to the Greek Patriarchs of Antioch, Alexandria, and Jerusalem.

Advices from Berlin of the 13th inst. state that the Russian expedition against Khiva, was encountering many impediments in its march—the Khan having caused all the bridges over the numerous streams, canals, and drains which intersect the country to be destroyed. Wood being scarce, the Russians procured the means of re-establishing the communications; and being constantly harrassed by the cavalry of the Usbecks, their progress has been slow.

The Univers publishes a letter from St. Petersburgh, which states that the Emperor has just issued an ukase, directing that any person attempting to convert any Russian subject from the Greek Established Church to any other religion shall be subject to certain penalties; and that all the ecclesiastics guilty of such an offence shall be proceeded against by the civil tribunals, instead of the Spiritual Courts, as heretofore.

"A new marriage," says the Temps, "is talked of for the imperial family of Russia. Adol, reigning Duke of Nassau, is to be the husband of the Grand Duchess Olga, youngest daughter of the Emperor. This marriage is said to have been arranged long since between the late Duke of Nassau and the Emperor Nicholas.

GREECE.

Letters from Athens of the 29th ultimo afford new evidence of the devotion of King Otho to Russia, and of course of his Majesty's enmity to France and England. Alarmed for his own safety, the King had for a moment suspended his observance of a plan laid down by Capo d'Istrais, and had even dismissed the grand conspirator, Glarakis, but repented the very next day, and continued near his person Gennaios Colocotroni and his party, although within the week preceding the date of our letter a gens'darme, a creature of Colocotroni's, was arrested near Megara, concealed in whose clothes were found more than 30 letters to the disaffected in Morea, encouraging them to preserve and keep up their spirits.

HOLLAND.

Letters received in Paris from the Hague gave rise to much uneasiness respecting the course of events in case the marriage of the King with the Countess d'Oultremont takes place. It was supposed that his Majesty had yielded to the advice of his children, the opinion of his Ministers, and the public voice pronounced by the press, in giving up the ill-advised match, and that Madame d'Oultremont had gone into Italy as the best proof of that determination. It seems now, however, that the King is determined to marry this Belgian lady; and the Dutch nobility and people are so irritated on the subject, that it is apprehended some national calamity will be the immediate consequence. Indeed, these letters go so far as to say that the King will be requested to abdicate, and that if he should refuse to do so on the first demand, strong measures will be resorted too to compel him relinquish the throne.

CHINA.

A letter in the London Mercantile Journal, dated Tongkoo, Dec. 14th says:

"The imperial command in announcing the stoppage for ever of the English trade makes an exception in favor of the ships Thomas Coults and Royal Saxon, which are allowed to trade. The Americans are reaping a rich harvest, and the transhipping trade is brisk; the Captain of an American vessel entered the port with 2000 bales of cotton, and offered to return to Tongkoo, and re-enter the port with a similar cargo."

SUMMARY.

The Steamboat Napoleon, on her way to Albany on the evening of the 23d ult., struck the bow of a sloop supposed to be Hannah Ann of Peekskill, by which the railing of the steamer was broken. A passenger on the boat by the name of Charles H. Degrove, supposed to be struck by the bowsprit of the sloop, was so much injured as to die almost instantly. It is said the accident was unavoidable by the steamer.

The Marietta (Pa.) [illegible] of the 22d ult., says:—"The intelligence has just been received, that yesterday afternoon, James Patterson had both legs nearly severed below the knees, by a train of cars passing over him. He was endeavoring to pass over the top of the cars to reach a break, as the train was entering a bridge near Parksburgh. Being unable to secure himself in time, he was knocked off between the cars, and eleven cars passed over him.

The Hon. Hugh L. White, late U. S. Senator from Tennessee, died at his residence at Knoxville, on the morning of the 10th ult.

On the 20th his death was announced to the Senate, by his immediate successor, Mr. Anderson. Mr. A. spoke of the distinguished Senator in suitable terms. Mr. Preston followed in a strain of eulogy, on the public and private character of his deceased friend, after which, the customary resolutions in testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, were adopted.

Mr. Peter Edes, the oldest printer in the U. S. died at Bangor on the 28th of March, in the 85th year of his age.

The monument erected to the memory of Gen. Brock, on the heights of Queenston, U. C., was recently destroyed in the following manner:—

The inhabitants of Lewiston and Queenston, were aroused about 4 o'clock in the morning, by a report like that of heavy artillery. On looking out a column of smoke was seen slowly ascending from the tall monument, and as it cleared away, the obelisk like tower was discovered to be rent and shattered from turret to foundation stone.

Bemis's powder mill in Spencer Mass., was recently blown up, and three persons killed.

The second detachment of U. S. artillery, consisting of 150 men, left Montpelier Vt. on the 16th ult., for Houlton, Maine.

Mr. D. L. Seymour, of Ogdensburgh, it is said, has been appointed Agent of the States Prison at Sing Sing.

The Vice Chancellor has decided, that an issue of Post Notes by banking associations, is unlawful.

Two Americans from the State of Maine, James Nisbet and Gerard Welsh, in a criminal Court at Quebec, were condemned to pay a fine of £40, (imprisonment till paid,) and six months imprisonment, and stand on the pillory, for enticing soldiers to desert.

On the evening of the 25th ult., Cazenovia and vicinity, in this county, was visited with a heavy shower of rain, which caused considerable damage to mill-dams, bridges, ploughed lands, and in many instances, carried off the soil and newly sowed grain.

Jumping the Rope.—The Boston Traveler states that a little school girl bantered with her comrades that she could "skip the rope" one hundred times on foot without stopping. She performed her boast, but it nearly proved fatal to her. She was taken into the school house, and from thence to her home, covered with blood. Not only was the foot on which she skipped bathed in blood, but it exuded from every pore in her skin, and stood in small drops all over her body, arms and face. She remained in an extremely dangerous state for several days, but is now recovering.

A disgraceful scene.—In the midst of a desultory debate, (April 21st,) Mr. Rice Garland and Mr. Bynum had a passage at arms on the floor of the House, and after an exchange of blows were separated by their friends. A committee was immediately appointed to investigate the matter and report to the House. The opinion was freely expressed, that it was high time some decisive steps were taken to vindicate the honor of the body, and protect it from the frequent repitition of such scens.

A Double Murder.—The Louisville Journal states on the authority of a Vicksburg paper, that Joseph W. W. Wade, and H. D. Robertson, both formerly of Hinds county, Miss., and more recently of Louisiana, met a few days ago on the west of the Mississippi, a little obove Vicksburg, and killed each other.

The Currency.—A bill requiring all the Banks of this State to Redeem their notes at half of one per cent. discount either in New York or Albany, has passed both branches of the Legislatnre.

Terrible Conflagration at Kingston U. C.—A tremendous fire, accidentally communicated by sparks from a steamboat, took place at Kingston, U. C. on the night of the seventeenth instint. The number of buildings reported to have been consumed, is 70, and among the property destroyed is said to have been about 15,000 barrels of flour and the furniture of the steamer Greart Britain. The boat from which the fire was communicated had just arrived from Oswego, and the captain, by the advice of his friends, to avoid threatened violence, immediately lefr the port, and was the first bearer to Oswego of the account of the conflagration. The loss is estimated at half a million.

From the Albany Evening Journal.

THE GIANT BOY.

This wonderful boy who is to be exhibited to the public during the present week in this City, is the son of Mr. Denslow Barber, of Richmond, Chittenden co. Vt. He was born in May 1836, and is now about three years and eleven months old. He is four feet in height; weighs about 100 pounds; and with the exception of a slight curve of the legs below the knee, occasioned by walking too early, and the great weight of the body, is in every respect proportioned like a man; and has the muscular strength of a boy of sixteen. The mind and general expression of the face exhibit the sprightliness and prying curiosity of the child of six or eight years, while the hair, whiskers, voice and physical lineaments are those of a man of 25 or 30.

We understand that Drs. March, McNaughton, Armsby, Hun, and several other gentlemen have examined the boy, and the testimonials relative to his age and early developement, and are satisfied as to the authenticity of the accounts which are given of him.

It is a subject well worthy the attention of the curious and scientific, and will furnish to all a useful and instructive lesson.

From the St. Louis Republican. April 6th.

HORRIBLE AFFRAY AND LOSS OF LIFE.

By the passengers and officers of the steam boat Otter, we have the following particulars of a serious affray, which occurred in Bellevue, I. T. two miles below Galena, on Wednesday last, the first of April. The circumstances are thus stated:

It has long been known that there was a party of desperadoes, horse thieves, counterfeiters &c. in that quarter. A man by the name of W. W. Brown, kept a tavern in Bellevue, and was believed to be the head of a gang, his house forming the half way house in their passage up and down the river. When a horse was stolen, it was brought to Brown's and sold to him, generally in the presence of some of the gang, who would swear to the purchase, and immediately run off. Some horses had been lately stolen, and were traced to his possession, which, upon demand, he refused to give up, or account for. A warrant was taken out for him and placed in the hands of the sheriff. On the 1st, Sheriff A. Warner attempted to arrest Brown, but he having fortified his house, and having a party of some twenty or thirty men with him, refused to be taken. The Sheriff thereupon summoned a posse of the citizens to attack the house.

Upon the approach of the Sheriff's party, the party in the house fired upon them, killing one man. The Sheriff's party returned the fire, and several fires ensued, in the course of which, the following persons were killed or wounded.

Of the thieves, W. W. Brown, Thomas Farley, both killed. An old man named Butty, a man by the name of Welsh and several others, severely wounded; some others were slightly wounded. A young man on the boat says that a man named Filler, and another of Brown's party, died before the Otter left, but it is not so stated in the list furnished by the Clerk.

Of the Sheriff's party, there were killed, Mr. H. Palmer, Mr. Maxwell, and Mr. Vaughan. Mr. E. Day and Mr. John Brinker, were mortally wounded and the latter was reported to be dead before the boat left having been shot through the body. Mr. Welsh, Col. Collins, Mr. Beaty, Gen. J. G. McDonald, and several others were slightly wounded.

Five or six fires passed between the assailants and Brown's party. Those defending the house, had the doors fastened, and defended it from the windows and other apertures, chiefly from the upper windows; each man having a table before him, on which he had four or five loaded rifles. After the lapse of a few minutes the assailants forced open the doors and succeeded in capturing a number of men in the house.

When the Otter left, they had in custody 8 or 10 prisoners, whom they intend to try and punish by lynch law that evening. The following are the names of some of those arrested; Trask, Fox, Coy, Stower and Thomas Welch. Between 2 and 3000 of the citizens of the surrounding country had collected on the ground, nearly all armed and very much excited.

Thomas Farley, noticed in the above, as one of those killed in Brown's house, is supposed not to have been of his party, but to be a traveller, who in company with two or three others, had stopped at the tavern, and were in the house at the time of the assault.

Brown was a very desperate character, and his family are all represented of the same stamp. Mrs. Brown, his wife, herself fired several times from a back window. Five or six of Brown's party fled, and had not been taken.

The arrangements on both sides, had been pending several days, and several propositions had been made by the citizens, to Brown, to leave the town, which he refused, when the citizens combined for the purpose of taking him, and in this way both parties had been enabled to assemble in tolerable strong numbers.

Mr. H. Palmer, who was killed, left a family of six or seven small children. The scene inside of Brown's house, where the dead and wounded men were yet lying on the floor, and the exasperated crowd walking about amongst them; the floor covered with blood, is represented as being truly appalling. The opinion prevailed that some of the prisoners would be executed, and that if any were let off they would be forced to leave the country.

TWO MISSIONARIES EATEN BY SAVAGES.

Through the kindness of a gentleman in this city, we are permitted to publish an extract of a letter received by him, containing the heart rending intelligence that two Missionaries in New Zeland have shared the fate of Lyman and Munson!

SIDNEY, N. S. Wales, Dec. 1st, 1839.

"The Missionary brig "Camden" left Upolu the day before our ship sailed, and arrived here last evening, bringing news that two of the Missionaries who sailed in her during a visit to the Island of Ewomango, one of the New Hebrides, were killed and eaten by the natives.

They were Williams and Harris: I knew them both at Upolu—Mr. Williams quite intimately; he was a highly intelligent and gentlemanly man; one of the most indefatigable of all Christian missionaries. He is the author of a very valuable work on South Sea Islands: a third gentleman not a missionary, Mr. Cunningham, who was with them at the time, escaped by flight, and I have the painful intelligence from his own lips. Mr. Harris was in ill health, and could not make his escape, while Mr. Williams was rather advanced in life."

Mr. Cunningham, who heard the war cry raised, turned and saw Mr. Harris pursued by the savages; and in an instant after he saw him fall, pierced through with many spears. Mr. C. then urged Mr. Williams to run for the boat, which was at some distance. The latter misunderstood him, and ran into the water to swim off to the brig, but was over taken and murdered. Mr. C. with difficulty reached the boat, and made his escape.

These unfortunate missonaries were sent out by the London Missionary Society, and the vessel spoken of in the letter was one employed in its service.—N. Y. Observer.

LATER FROM TEXAS.

A letter from Texas, published in the Baltimore American, describes a treacherous encounter between a body of Texan troops, under the personal direction of the Secretary of War and a party of the Cumanche Indians. It appears that a party of about sixty-five Indians had arrived at San Antonio, bringing with them Miss Lockhart, a little girl captured from another tribe about eighteen months ago. Their avowed objects to ransom their prisoners, and ascertain what would be paid for the return of other prisoners in their possession.

The Indians attended a council to which they had been invited, twelve chiefs being assembled in a room, while the others remained in the rear of the house. All at once a company of Texan troops was marched into the room. On being told they were prisoners, the chiefs instantly made battle and were all shot. The Indians outside the house also attacked the soldiers, but they were repulsed and captured. A small number of them who escaped across the river were pursued by mounted men, and every fugitive killed but a renagade Mexican. The loss of the Indians amounted to thirty-five men, two women and three children. The Texan loss was seven killed and eight wounded.

The Steam packet Columbia, arrived at New-Orleans on the 12th inst. and brought intelligence somewhat later. Houston Morning Star says:—

We wait with great impatience for another arrival from San Antonio, as it will probably bring us accounts of the result which followed the despatch of messenger to Cumanche, to inform them of our readiness to exchange prisoners with them. The majority among us appear to be ignorant of the great sufferings imposed upon the unfortunate women and children who are in bondage to these cruel and ruthless savages. It is doubtful what course these devils will pursue in regard to their captives, when they are informed of the blood that has been shed. They may murder them in revenge, and then make a dash upon the forces guarding the prisioners taken at Baxar."

No less than 230 vessels from the United States, arrived at Galveston last year; and 92 since the 1st January, 1840, up to 1st of April.

The Galveston Price Current of the 7th instant, quotes Texas Treasury Notes at 77 a 80 per cent discount; and remarks—business generally is excessively dull, and prices of every commodity merely nominal—the heavy supply and limited demands preventing more active operations.

The Texan brig of war Galveston, arrived at Galveston on the 9th inst. from Baltimore, in 26 days. Also, H. B. M. sloop of war Pilot, Ramsay, 4 days from Havana. Also, ship Virginia, of New-York, 94 days from London.

We request our brother Editors through out Ohio, Indiana, Michigan and other States, to give immediate currency to the fact that the Legislature of New York, by a unanimous vote, has repealed all laws authorizing the Imprisonment for Debt of Non-Residents of this State. Citizens of other States are henceforth to enjoy all the rights and immunities of citizens of this State, as the Federal Constitution prescribes. Our mercantile friends in other States may now come among us to adjust their accounts and replenish their stores without fear of incarnation in New York, either at the suit of a griping creditor here or of some knave at home who takes this method of securing the payment of an unjust demand. It is due to our State that the fact be proclaimed throughout the country.—Alb. Eve. Jour.

Pennsylvania.—On the 16th inst., just as the Legislature of Pennsylvania were about to adjourn sine die, agreeably to a joint resolution of the two houses, they received a message from Governor Porter, notifying the members to convene in an extra session on the following day. Reason,—they had made no provision for the interest due, or to become due, on the States debt, before the next regular meeting of the Legislature, nor for certain other expenditures of indispensable necessity.

The extra session lasted but one day. They passed a bill authorizing the Governor to borrow $200,000 to defray the current expenses of the Government, and then adjourned to the 12th of May.

Brutal Murder.—Mrs. Hall, was killed on Thursday, at her residence at Hampstead, L. I., by a colored man whom she had employed about her garden. The murder was committed suddenly, doubtless under the influence of mere brute passion. Mrs. Hall was remonstrating with the man for some neglect of orders, when he raised his spade and struck her a fearful blow on the head, following it up with another on the neck, and a third on the back—either of the three being sufficient to cause death. Mrs. Hall was taken into the house, and died soon after—the murderer meantime quietly resuming his work as if nothing had happened. He was arrested and committed under the verdict of wilful murder, found by the coroner's jury.—Com. Adv.

Illustrations of Prophecy.

BY DAVID CAMPBELL.

No. 9, Washington Street, Boston.

THIS work of above 400 pages 18 mo. just published, embraces many of the views of distinguished writers on the prophecies of Daniel, and John, together with some of no small value, found in no other work. It is prepared as the reader will see, with unusual advantages of imparting to the eye the resemblance of the natural emblems used by the prophets. These will interest many of the young, especially to investigate the prophecies, which they have hitherto regarded as a sealed book; and with the geography of the prophecies, and chronological calculations peculiar to this work; it will afford much help to understand these parts of the Bible.—It also shows the erroneous ground of some modern propagators of an old but startling theory, that the 'end of all things is at hand.' Should the reader fail to find that fulness desirable, yet from so brief a dissertation, he will find much to gratify and instruct. It is a work demanded by the present exigency of the public mind, and is written with a good spirit, giving sober common sense views on matters of great interest.

The work contains 150 pictoral illustrations colored according to the description of the prophets: price $1,00. An Appendix in form of an Atlas, is prepared to accompany the work, which gives a view of countries, in which predicated events have taken place, and which are to take place: also large diagrams and chronological tables, entirely original in their arrangements. One of these plates, throws the entire chronology of the apocalypse, upon one square, to page with the seals, trumpets, and vials arranged in the most skilful manner exhibiting symmetry and beauty, as well as harmony of numbers.

☞Editors who insert the above notice, will be entitled to a copy of the work and atlas, by ordering them from No. 9 Washington street, Boston; 126 Fulton street, New-York.

POETRY.

POLLOK'S DESCRIPTION OF LORD BYRON.

Take one example, to our purpose quite
A man of rank, and of capacious soul,
Who riches had, and fame, beyond desire,
An heir of flattery, to titles born,
And reputation, and luxurious life:
Yet, not content with ancestorial name,
Or to be known because his fathers were,
He on this height hereditary stood,
And, gazing higher, purposed in his heart
To take another step. Above him seemed,
Alone, the mount of song, the lofty seat
Of canonized bards; and thitherward,
By nature taught, and inward melody,
In prime of youth, he bent his eagle eye.
No cost was spared. What books he wished, he read:
What sage to hear, he heard; what scenes to see,
He saw. And first in rambling school-boy days,
Britannia's mountain-walks, and heath-girt lakes,
And story-telling glens, and founts, and brooks,
And maids, as dew-drops pure and fair, his soul
With grandeur filled, and melody, and love.
Then travel came, and took him where he wished.
He cities saw, and courts, and princely pomp;
And mused alone on ancient mountain-brows;
And mused on battle-fields, where valor fought
In other days; and mused on ruins grey
With years; and drank from old and fabulous wells,
And plucked the vine that first-born prophets plucked;
And mused on famous tombs, and on the wave
Of Ocean mused, and on the desert waste;
The heavens and earth of every country saw.
Where'er the old inspiring Genii dwelt,
Aught that could rouse, expand, refine the soul,
Thither he went, and meditated there.

He touched his harp, and nations heard, entranced.
As some vast river of unfailing source,
Rapid, exhaustless, deep, his numbers flowed,
And opened new fountains in the human heart.
Where fancy halted, weary in her flight,
In other men, his fresh as morning rose,
And soared untrodden heights, and seemed at home,
Where angels bashful looked. Others, tho' great,
Beneath their argument seemed struggling whiles;
He from above descending, stooped to touch
The loftiest thought; and proudly stooped, as tho'
It scarce deserved his verse. With Nature's self
He seemed an old acquaintance, free to jest
At will with all her glorious majesty.
He laid his hand upon "the Oceans's mane,"
And played familiar with his hoary locks.
Stood on the Alps, stood on the Appennines,
And with the thunder talked, as friend to friend;
And wove his garland of the lightning's wing,
In sportive twist—the lightning's wing,
Which, as the footsteps of the dreadful God,
Marching upon the storm in vengeance seemed—
Then turned, and with the grasshopper, who sung
His evening song, beneath his feet, conversed.
Suns, moons, and stars, and clouds his sisters were;
Rocks, mountains, meteors, seas, & winds, & storms,
His brothers—younger brothers, whom he scarce
As equals deemed. All passions of all men—
The wild and tame—the gentle and severe;
All thoughts, all maxims, sacred and profane;
All creeds s all seasons, Time, Eternity;
All that was hated, and all that was dear;
All that was hoped, all that was feared by man,
He tossed about, as tempest, withered leaves,
Then smiling looked upon the wreck he made.
With terror now he froze the cowering blood;
And now dissolved the heart in tenderness;
Yet would not tremble, would not weep himself.
But back into his soul retired, alone,
Dark, sullen, proud: gazing contemptuously
On hearts and passions prostrate at his feet.
So Ocean from the plains, his waves had late
To desolation swept, retired in pride,
Exulting in the glory of his might,
And seemed to mock the ruin he had wrought.

As some fierce comet of tremendous size,
To which the stars did reverence, as it passed;
So he through learning, and through fancy took
His flight sublime; and on the loftiest top
Of Fame's dread mountain sat: not soiled, and worn,
As if he from the earth had labored up;
But as some bird of heavenly plumage fair,
He looked, which down from higher regions came,
And perched it there, to see what lay beneath.

The nations gazed, and wondered much, and prais'd.
Critics before him fell in humble plight;
Confounded fell; and made debasing signs
To catch his eye; and stretched, and swelled themselves
To bursting nigh, to utter bulky words
Of admiration vast; and many too,
Many that aimed to imitate his flight,
With weaker wing, unearthly fluttering made,
And gave abundant sport to after days.

Great man! the nations gazed, and wondered much,
And praised: and many called his evil good.
Wits wrote in favor of his wickedness;
And kings to do him honor took delight.
Thus full of titles, flattery, honor, fame;
Beyond desire, beyond ambition full,—
He died—he died of what? Of wretchedness.
Drank every cup of joy, heard every trump
Of fame; drank early, deeply drank; drank draughts
That common millions might have quench'd, then died
Of thirst, because there was no more to drink.
His goddess, Nature, wooed, embraced, enjoyed,
Fell from his arms, abhorred; his passions died,
Died, all but dreary, solitary Pride;
And all his sympathies in being died.
As some ill-guided bark, well built and tall,
Which angry tides cast out on desert shore,
And then, retiring, left it there to rot
And moulder in the winds and rains of heaven;
So he, cut from the sympathies of life,
And cast ashore from pleasure's boisterous surge,
A wandering, weary, worn, and wretched thing,
Scorched, and desolate, and blasted soul,
A gloomy wilderness of dying thought,—
Repined, and groaned, and withered from the earth.
His groanings filled the land, his numbers filled;
And yet he seemed ashamed to groan.—Poor man!—
Ashamed to ask, and yet he needed help.

Proof this, beyond all lingering of doubt,
That not with natural or mental wealth,
Was God delighted, or his peace secured;
That not in natural or mental wealth,
Was human happiness or grandeur found.
Attempt how monstrous, and how surely vain!
With things of earthly sort, with aught but God,
With aught but moral excellence, truth, and love,
To satisfy and fill the immortal soul!
Attempt, vain inconceivably! attempt,
To satisfy the Ocean with a drop,
To marry immortality to Death,
And with the unsubstantial Shade of Time,
To fill the embrace of all Eternity!

MISCELLANEOUS.

DINNERS OF RICHELIEU.

During the time Cardinal Richelieu had such tyrannic sway in the legislative concerns of France, an old military officer, who resided upon a small estate in Normandy, had occasion to visit Paris on some private business. He had been some days in the capital, when, on returning to his hotel, one evening, he found on his table, a note addressed to himself, in the hand-writing of the Cardinal, which proved to be nothing else than an invitation to dine at the Chateau de Ruel the next day. So great an honor was as surprising as it was unexpected. He, however, attributed this high distinction to some friend at Court, and set out in time to arrive in the hour appointed. The old soldier commenced his journey on foot, and having ascended the hill of Neuilly, he perceived a cabriolet approaching. Having some doubt whether he had taken the right road, he inquired of the occupant of the vehicle his way to Ruel.

"To Ruel?" answered the stranger, "if you will accept of a seat in my chaise, I will be happy to drive you thither. That is my destination also"

With many thanks for his politeness our officer entered the cabriolet, and began to converse freely with his new companion.

"I am going to dine with the Cardinal," said the latter.

"Mon Dieu!" exclaimed the veteran. "How very singular I am about to do the very same thing; yet I am at a loss to know how I deserve so high an honor, for never, to my knowledge, have I served his highness in any way; neither have I been introduced to him."

"How!" exclaimed the driver of the cabriolet, with surprise—and then, changing his manner, he said, slowly and sorrowfully, "You have never seen the Cardinal, and you and I are to dine with him to-day. I pity you."

"Good Heavens!" what has made you change countenance?"

"Call up every circumstance from the recesses of your memory," said the stranger, with great earnestness. I conjure you to recollect yourself. Have you never directly or indirectly had any communication, personally, or otherwise, with the prime minister?"

"Indeed, never to my knowledge."

"Try again, I implore you," continued the gentleman, with increased anxiety.—"That circumstance is of the greatest importance to you, although you may not believe it."

Sir, you alarm me, ejaculated the veteran.

"Not unnecessarily, I can assure you.—Scrutinize your conduct well. Have you never alluded to the cardinal in any public way?"

"Not that I can remember."

"O, I beg pardon. Yes, I had forgotten when at court, some time since, I published a few poems. Among them was an epigram not very flattering to his highness."

"I thought so. Listen to the fatal lot that awaits you. The Cardinal has discovered in you an enemy. His vengeance is terrible. He never invites me but when some horrid crime is to be performed. You are the victim to-day."

"Horrible!" exclaimed the old officer. How may I believe you?"

"I am the best authority for what you have just learned. In me you behold—"

"Who?"

"The executioner! I feel happy in warning you—in saving at least one victim from premature death."

"How, how can I reward you?" said the veteran.

"Only by keeping the secret of my having your life, and not forgetting me. Fly. Leave Paris with all speed."

The officer lost no time in descending from his cab, and making the best of his way to Paris, from whence he set out on the same evening on the route to his residence in Normandy; and it was not long after he had the double satisfaction of learning the death of Richelieu, and expressing his gratitude to his friend, the executioner.

This, then, is the history of the snug dinners at Ruel. They were always tee-a-tete parties, consisting of only three guests—the Cardinal, the executioner, and the victim. The cheer was capital—rare dishes and excellent wines, which were enhanced by the affability and bonhommie of the host. After dinner his excellency would propose an adjournment to a neighboring apartment. He entered first, then the executioner, and lastly the victim, who was instantly precipitated into a vault, under the floor, which was raised by the executioner, by means of a spring. This was as quickly closed, and the "finisher of the law" returned home, while the Cardinal retired to enjoy his dessert.

HUMAN PHENOMENON.

The last report of the Boston Asylum for the Blind gives a large variety of further intelligence concerning the progress of Laura Bridgman, the little girl of whom our readers have heard something. Besides being deaf, and dumb, and blind, she is also deprived of the sense of smell, and enjoys taste but imperfectly—the touch, alone being the medium of communication between her and the outer world. It is gratifying to know that careful observations continue to be made with a view of ascertaining the order of developements and the peculiar character of her intellectual faculties. We quote the following interesting statements:—Empire State.

The intellectual improvement of this interesting being, and the progress she has made in expressing her ideas, is truly gratifying.

She uses the manual alphabet of the deaf mutes, with great facility and great rapidity; she has increased her vocabulary so as to comprehend the names of all common objects.

She can count to high numbers: she can add and subtract small numbers.

But the most gratifying acquirement she has made, and the one which has given her the most delight, is the power of writing a legible hand, and expressing her thoughts upon paper. She writes with a pencil, in a groved line, and makes her letters clear and distinct.

She was sadly puzzled at first to know the meaning of the process to which she was subject, but when the idea dawned upon her mind, that by means of it she could convey intelligence to her mother, her delight was unbounded. She applied herself with great diligence, and in a few months actually wrote a legible letter to her mother; in which she conveyed information of her being well, and of her coming home in ten weeks.

She has improved very much in personal appearance, as well as in intellect—her countenance beams with intelligence—she is always active at study, work or play—she never repines, and most of the time is gay and frolicsome.

She is now very expert with her needle; she knits very easily, and can make twine bags and various fancy articles, very prettily. She is very docile—has a quick sense of propriety—dresses herself with great neatness, and is always correct in her deportment. In short it would be difficult to find a child in the possession of all her senses, and the enjoyment of the advantages that parental love can bestow, who is more contented and cheerful, or to whom existence seems a greater blessing, than it does to this bereaved creature, for whom the sun has no light, the air no sound, and the flowers no color nor smell.

No definite course of instruction can be marked out; for her inquisitiveness is so great, that she is very much disconcerted if any question which occurred to her is to be deferred until the lesson is over. It is deemed best to gratify her, if her enquiry has any bearing on the lesson; and often she leads her teacher far away from the objects he commenced with.

In her eagerness to advance her knowledge of words, and to communicate her ideas, she coins words, and is always guided by analogy. Sometimes her process of word-making is very interesting; for instance, after some time spent in giving her an idea of the abstract meaning of alone, she seemed to obtain it, and understanding that being by one's self was to be alone, or al-one. She was told to go to her chamber, or school, or elsewhere, ~~and return alone~~, she did so; but soon after, wishing to go with one of the little girls, she strove to express her meaning thus—Laura go al-two.

She has the same fondness for dress, for ribbons, and for finery, as other girls of her age, and as a proof that it arises from the same amiable desire of pleasing others, it may be remarked, that whenever she has a new bonnet, or any new article of dress, she is particularly desirous to go to meeting, or to go out with it. If people do not notice it, she directs their attention by placing their hand upon it.

She seems to have a perception of character, and to have no esteem for those who have little intellect. The following anecdote is significant of her perception of character, and shews that from her friends she requires something more than good natured indulgence.

A new scholar entered school—a little girl about Laura's age. She was very helpless, and Laura took great pride and great pains in showing her the way about the house, assisting her to dress and undress, and doing for her many things which she could not do herself.

In a few weeks it began to be apparent even to Laura, that the child was not only helpless, but naturally very stupid, being almost an idiot. Then Laura gave her up in despair and avoided her, and has ever since had an aversion to being with her, passing by her as if in contempt. By a natural association of ideas she attributes to this child all those countless deeds which Mr. Nobody does in every house—if a chair is broken, or any thing misplaced and no one knows who did it, Laura attributes it at once to this child.

* * * * * * *

With regard to the sense of touch it is very acute even for a blind person. It is shown remarkably in the readiness with which she distinguishes persons; there are forty inmates in the female wing, with all of whom of course Laura is acquainted;—whenever she is walking through the passage ways, she perceives by the jar of the floor, or the agitation of the air, that some one is near her, and it is exceedingly difficult to pass her without being recognized. Her little arms are stretched out, and the instant she grasps a hand, a sleeve, or even part of the dress, she knows the person, and lets them pass on with some sign of recognition.

The innate desire for knowledge, and the instinctive efforts which the human faculties make to exercise their functions, is shown most remarkably in Laura. Her tiny fingers are to her as eyes, and ears, and nose, and most deftly and incessantly does she keep them in motion; like feelers of some insects which are continually agitated, and which touch every grain of sand in the path, so Laura's arms and hands are continually in play; and when she is walking with a person she not only recognizes every thing she passes within touching distance, but by continually touching her companions hands she ascertains what he is doing. A person walking across the room while she had hold on his left arm, would find it hard to take a pencil out of his waistcoat pocket with his right hand, without her perceiving it.

Her judgment of distances and of relations of place is very accurate; she will rise from her seat, go straight towards the door, put out her hand just at the right time, and grasp the handle with precision.

The constant and tireless exercise of her feelers gives her a very accurate knowledge of every thing about the house; so that if a new article, a bundle, bandbox, or even a new book, is laid any where in the apartments which she frequents, it would be but a short time before in her ceaseless rounds she would find it, and from something about it she would generally discover to whom it belonged.

At table, if told to be still, she sits and conducts herself with propriety; handles her cup, spoon, and fork, like other children; so that a stranger looking at her, would take her for a very pretty child with green ribbon over her eyes.

But when at liberty to do as she chooses, she is continually feeling of things, and ascertaining their size, shape, destiny and use—asking their names and their purposes, going on with insatiable curiosity, step by step, towards knowledge.

Thus doth her active mind, though all silent and darkling within, commune by means of her one sense, with things external, and gratify its innate craving for knowledge by close and ceaseless attention.

Qualities and appearances, unappreciable or unheeded by others, are to her of great significance and value; and by means of these her knowledge of external nature and physical relations will in time become extensive.

PROVERBS.

Once in ten years, every man needs his neighbor.

Either say nothing of the absent, or speak like a friend.

He that would be well spoken of himself, must not speak ill of others.

He that doth the kindness, hath the noblest pleasure of the two.

He that doth a kindness to a good man, doth a greater to himself.

Keep your mouth shut, and your eyes open.

Shew not all the bottom either of your purse or of your mind.

One lie draws ten more after it.

He who keeps good men company, may very well bear their charges.

He begins to grow bad, who takes himself to be a good man.

Let us do what we can and ought, and let God do his pleasure.

It is folly for an eminent man to think of escaping censure, and a weakness to be affected with it. ~~Fabius Maximus said, he~~ was a greater coward that was afraid of reproach, than he that fled from his enemies.

FOR THE FARMER.

CAUSE OF SEEDS NOT GERMINATING.

We have known and heard of considerable loss and disappointment from seeds, particularly onion seeds, not growing. We have thought and inquired in reference to the cause, and the result of our cogitations and enquiries may be thus stated:

Without a certain degree of moisture, seeds will not germinate. On dry, sandy soils, and in a dry season, it seems highly probable, then, that seeds may be deprived of the requisite degree of moisture: perhaps receiving just as much as will mould them, and destroy their vitality, or being so near the surface as to be injured by the sun's heat and light.

But the seeds may have germinated, and have commenced to send out their roots, and stem stocks, and yet to be destroyed. If the soil is not pressed closely to seeds, and very dry weather occurs just at this period of the process of germination, the root being too distant from the soil, and too feeble to draw any supply of moisture, the liquid food of the plant contained in the fermented seed may be dried up, and the life thus destroyed.

If you would avoid disappointment and loss from seeds failing to grow, the preventive process is indicated by a knowledge of the causes most frequently productive of the result, which we think are those stated above. If you sprout your seeds before putting them into the ground, you will preserve them from the first cause of failure, but if you pulverize your soil throughout and press, in this state, with a hoe, spade, or roller, upon the seeds thus sprouted, the root stem will soon and surely derive sufficient moisture from the soil.

In a few instances I have found my neighbors blaming the seeds as useless, particularly of onions, carrots and parsnips, when I have obtained a little of the seed and found it to sprout quite well. You may easily save yourselves from such reflections, or from the temptation to blame others, by steeping the suspected seed in warm or tepid water, from six to twenty-four hours, according to the size and hardness of the seeds, and then setting it away in a warmish place for a day or two. If good, it will sprout in this time; if kept warm in a darkish place and it does not sprout in this time, the seed is faulty.

In connection with this subject, I may state that several circumstances incline me to the belief that corn which has been sprouted—no matter in what steep—is safe from the ravages of the red and wire worm. It has been fashionable to steep it in a strong solution of copperas, and to ascribe the safety of the seed in this state, not to the change which fermentation has produced in the germ or chit which is usually first attacked, but to the change in the taste from the copperas. We have known corn soaked in simple water—in water alone—to escape from the attacks of the worm as well as that soaked in a copperas steep.—Until this matter is made more certain, however, I would hold it bad husbandry to neglect the copperas, as in addition to the change produced by heat and moisture, we have also the disagreeable taste communicated by this salt.

THE NEW-YORKER.

THE publishers of the New-Yorker respectfully announce the commencement of a new volume of their journal on the 21st of September being the Eighth of the double Quarto Edition, and completing the Sixth year of its publication in the Folio or common newspaper form.

The New-Yorker is now so widely known as to render superfluous any detailed delineation of its character and objects. Suffice it here that the work is intended to sustain the reputation of a Weekly Literary Journal not inferior in ability and standing to any on either side of the Atlantic. About two thirds of its columns are devoted to the best Original and Selected Literature, comprising Reviews, Essays (Scientific and Literary,) Tales, Poems, choice extracts from New Works, Biographical and Historical Sketches, &c. &c. In this department, Critical Notices of nearly all new publications of interest will be given. The remaining columns will be devoted to a condensed abstract of the Political and General Intelligence of the day, Domestic and Foreign. Under this head the returns of all important Elections throughout the United States will be carefully compiled and compared with those of former Elections, so as to give a clear exhibit of the relative strength of each political party in the several States. All political movements of interest will likewise be briefly and impartially chronicled. In fine, it will be the general aim of this paper to be first useful and instructive, then agreeable and entertaining. The steady support through the last three years of an average of more than 8,000 subscribers warrants the belief that the conduct of the work has not disappointed the hopes of its friends, while it has secured the decided approval of an intelligent public. Such as it has been it will continue to be, with the additional aid already secured in its Editorial department, to which it is hoped that stil further strength will be added by arrangements now in progress. If unwearied exertion and a fixed resolve to spare no labor or expense which may tend to elevate the character of their work can avail any thing, the undersigned are justified in cherishing a confidence that their journal will at any rate maintain the standing it has already attained in the public estimation.

H. GREELEY & CO.

THE LARGEST NEWSPAPER IN NEW-YORK.

TERMS—Three Dollars per annum, or two copies for Five Dollars.

The publishers of THE EMPIRE STATE, having completed their arrangements for the Enlarged Series of that paper, will issue on Thursday, January 9th, the first number of the largest Newspaper ever published in New York. Having procured new materials wherewith to execute the printing in a style of elegance unsurpassed by any other newspaper—and having also secured such aid in the several departments, local and general, literary and political, of the paper, as to ensure its worth as a valuable FAMILY NEWSPAPER, the publishers offer it with entire confidence to the patronage of an enlightened public, and a full reliance upon their taste and discrimination for support.

We have chosen the title of "The Empire State," as expressive not only of our attachment to the interests of New York, but of the Union; for whatever interests New York, in a great degree, interests the Union—whether in prosperity or in adversity.—And, as the Empire City is the great centre of business and commerce of the country—the point also where Intelligence from the European World is first received, and from which it radiates throughout the Union; so is New York, in many respects, if not in all, the most eligible point for the establishment of a valuable National Newspaper, as the medium through which shall be diffused to the States and Territories of the Republic, the earliest Intelligence, general and political, from every part of the world,

* * * * * *

The mammoth size of our paper enabling us to present weekly an amount of matter contained in no other paper—we shall labor to present such a variety, original and selected, as will suit the tastes of all classes. The Politician, the Moralist, the Farmer, the Mechanic, the Merchant, and Professional Man, the Student and the Antiquary, the lover of humor, and such as would unfold a "Map of the Busy World,"—each and all may find amusement and instruction in the ample pages of the Empire State.

Some prominent features will be given to the paper, not found in any other. The utmost pains will be taken to present, at the earliest date, all important intelligence from every State in the Union—to collect and preserve Statistics and Important Facts, civil, political, and miscellaneous—to give full accounts of the proceedings of Congress, and of the Legislatures of the States—the best Speeches of distinguished American Orators and Statesmen—Memoirs of Eminent Men—Original Tales, Essays, and Poetry—Collections in the History and Antiquities of the Country—Improvements in Agriculture, and the Arts—Gems from the Current Literature of the Day—Notices of all New Works worthy of commendation—and Occurrences at Home and Abroad, commercial, monetary, or of whatever nature that can be of interest to the mass of readers throughout the country.

More, perhaps, we need not say—but submit our labors to the candid judgment of the public.

TERMS OF THE EMPIRE STATE.

ENLARGED SERIES.

The paper will be published on a Mammoth folio sheet, on paper of superior quality, and beautiful type.

The price will be $3 per annum—in all cases in advance. Two copies will be sent for $5. No paper sent until the money is received; and no subscriptions received for a less term than six months.

THE MISSIONARIES.

While contemplating the various pursuits in which mankind are engaged, I am led to consider how few there are, in comparison with the whole, who feel the obligations they are under to that Being who upholds the universe, and knows what our destiny will be when "time shall be no longer." We see a thoughtless multitude around us busily engaged in the active scenes of life. Some are toiling with ceaseless activity to accumulate wealth, and to lay up treasure here, almost forgetting that this world is not their "abiding place." Others are untiring in their efforts to gain the applause of their fellow-men, and seem more anxious to have their names recorded on the pages of history, than in the "Lamb's Book of Life." The votaries of pleasure are grasping after phantoms with as much eagerness, as if thousands of years hence would find them here still acting over the same scenes, and pursuing the same dull round of amusements, unmindful of the declaration of the Great God, who has said—"dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return." Still there are some who turn aside from the giddy throng, remembering,

> That in each cup of earthly bliss a poison lurks,
> In guise of specious form.

Some there are whose bosoms glow with love to God and benevolence toward their fellow-men, and are devising means and executing plans to ameliorate the condition of men. Among this number are the MISSIONARIES—those who are willing to sacrifice ease and affluence, home and country, to carry the word of life to the benighted heathen. They feel that they make but a small sacrifice when they consider that the Son of God left his Father's bosom and the "realms of light and glory," and came into this sinful world to purchase salvation for them. Yet they look not with indifference upon the blessings which are strewn around them, and of which they are made partakers, but prize them much—far above all price. They are not those whose hope disappointment's withering blight has crushed, and rendered their minds unfit for enjoyment; but they are rejoicing in the pride of manhood, and in their veins the blood flows freely.

> "But they are those denied to self, to earthly fame
> Denied, and earthly wealth, who kindred left,
> And home, and ease, and all the cultured joys,
> Conveniencies and delicate delights
> Of ripe society, in the great cause
> Of man's salvation."

They do not forget the soft endearments and early associations that cluster around the home of their childhood; but they remember with delight the bright gatherings around the evening hearth; the still and holy Sabbaths, and the sanctuary of the living God, standing in solitary grandeur amid the habitations of dying men, whose spire pointing up to heaven reminds the christian of that home "where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest." And when they remember these things, their imagination flits across the raging billows to their destined home where nothing meets the eye to cheer the fainting traveler, but temples dedicated to dumb idols, and men almost as senseless as the gods they worshiped performing their rites, at the sight of which the heart sickens and human nature revolts; but they remain fixed and unwavering in their purpose, and their bosoms burn with quenchless ardor to enter upon their labors, for they realize that time is short, and remember the words of the inspired penman who has said—"For what is your life? It is even a vapor, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away." And when their toils were ended it would matter not whether their bones bleached on the shores of India, or were gathered to rest with their fathers, for Heaven was their home, and their disembodied spirits would be wafted as quickly through boundless space to their Father's bosom from the burning sands of Africa, as from this their own dear native land! Let us follow them in our imagination, and view them at that hour when they are about to depart from their native shore. Even the passing stranger, as he traversed the thronged and busy streets, and near the wharves of the populous city, might suspect from appearances that something more than ordinary was about to be transacted, and this belief was confirmed as his eye glanced onward and he saw a splendid ship all freighted and ready to admit her passengers, and convey them to some distant port. Persons were seen standing in clusters, and seemed to be in deep conversation, and their countenances told that they were deeply interested in the events which were about to transpire. Was some one of the 'great ones of the earth,' whose reputation stood high in the estimation of his countrymen, and whose voice was often heard in the halls of legislation, now to be crowned with honors, and about to depart on an embassy to some foreign court—there to associate with nobles, and sit at the festive tables with Kings? No! Was it some mighty Chieftain, who had spread his victories far and wide, and imbrued his hands in the blood of his fellow-men, now going to extend his conquests in other lands, and spread blight and mildew along his path-way? Ah! no!———

> "They were a noiseless band of heavenly soldiery,
> From out the armory of God equipped,
> Invincible to conquer sin."

They were gathered together from different parts of the distant country, and perhaps they had never met before, yet they loved each other; their hearts were united by the love of Christ, and one common interest, and they were destined to the same heritage on earth, and looking forward to the time when their work would be done, and they should be made partakers of "an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away." They were now about to commit themselves to the care and protection of that Being who ruleth the raging of the stormy ocean, and who has said, "lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end." The misty clouds which overspread the sky were dispelled as the sun rose high, and higher, in the eastern horizon—all nature seemed to harmonize—even the restless ocean seemed not to dash its billows against the shore with its wonted fierceness—a Sabbath stillness pervades around—"a prayer was offered." Might not angels delight to witness such a scene? Methinks they lingered near—"a parting hymn was sung," and when the tones vibrate upon the ear of the christian, might it not remind him of that hour when the Sea should give up her dead, and they should be gathered "out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation," and unite together "and sing the song of Moses, the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb."

READING.

In canvassing the voluminous masses of books that are extant in the world, we shall find none that can compare with the word of God. Without it what would have been the condition of mankind? Let those portions of the earth which are veiled in heathen darkness answer. In the bible he who aspires after holiness may find examples worthy of his imitation. If he wishes something to feast his marvelousness and wonder, let him behold the father of the new world in his noble bark, braving the heaving element that deluged the earth; or turn his eyes upon the storm of wrath that was poured out upon Sodom and Gomorrah. Again cast an eye upon Sinai's peak, and there witness the awful thunders that rolled with such grandeur upon the ears of the astonished thousands of Israel's camp, while the invisible hand of Infinite Wisdom traced upon tables of stone, that moral code, whose jurisdiction extends to all mankind.

If we wish to tread the path of wisdom, where shall we find it more pleasingly marked out than in the pages of holy writ. There the son's of sorrow may learn of those who have trodden the same path, who were wont to drink of the cup of affliction. There, too, the orator may drink into the streams of true eloquence, as they flow from the lips of the Prophets in all their native simplicity. In short, the Bible is a paragon of beauty, a prodigy of wisdom, a revelation of mysteries which set forth its divine origin with arguments that cannot be refuted. It is the foundation of every truly magnificent structure that has ever been feared by the human intellect.

2. Profane history, when perused with right motives, may prove very advantageous. From its pages we may learn the way in which empires and kingdoms have wrought out their own ruin; admonishing by their fall the nations which succeed them. On its pages we may find the record of transactions that corroborate the truths spoken by the prophets of old.—Without the knowledge such records convey, many important events which are past must have remained unknown to us.

We find in the annals of history human nature displayed in its various attributes.—Hence, we can compare characters, and qualify ourselves better to distinguish the right means to be used to accomplish a desired object. Thus we may contrast an Alexander with a Socrates.

In the former we see an insatiable thirst for glory; urged on by an ambition, fanned by pride and flattery, until it knew no bounds, not even those set by the barriers of the great deep. While in the latter we behold those noble traits of character which distinguish the truly great and benevolent, who, disdaining the pomp of riches, sought for intellectual and moral wealth. Alexander could conquer the world; Socrates could accomplish much nobler feats. The storms of envy and malice that raged over his head with such threatning destruction, he could brave with a calmness that spoke of his Spartan discipline.

History is a mirror that reflects light upon the future. By reasoning from analogy, and tracing cause and effect we discover unalterable laws in the nature of things which cannot be trampled upon with impunity.

3. Biography might properly occupy a portion of our time. In pursuing this course, we may add to our experience in a short time that which cost others an age to acquire; not that we expect to derive the benefit of their practical experience; but their theory may be canvassed, and wherein time has proved it faulty, it may serve us as a chart does the mariner to point out the reefs and shoals that we may avoid them.

4. The less we indulge ourselves in fictitious reading the better. The mind has various passions, which can be best governed by keeping them in equilibrium—by calling into exercise the weaker while the stronger are to be repressed. Fictitious subjects, generally, set before our minds a field painted with the most glowing colors. We are led forth by a magic hand amid fairy scenes, there to gather flowers that are strewn along its varied path-way, till the dream of fancy is broken, and those lovely phantoms have fled forever from our eyes, and we find ourselves left on some sterile plain, without any cooling stream to allay the feverish thirst that rages within. It is evident that we must feel unhappy in the same ratio that those passions become excited without any proper or possible means of gratification.

Some may plead the cause of fictitious reading for the sake of its morals. It is like crowding morals into one ear, and common sense out of the other; for where we gain one moral drawn from fiction, we must admit its host of vicious servants with all their useless appendage, and each must have as good an entertainment in our minds as their worthy master.

The excessive novel reader becomes in one sense like the intemperate. His taste becomes vitiated, and all that is really worthy of his attention passes before his eyes unheeded. As the intemperate resort to their bottle to awaken their morbid sensibilities; so the excessive novel reader resorts to his phantasmagoria for something to feast his imagination.

5. As a general thing we read too much; not that we spend too great a portion of our time in reading; but we occupy too much ground. One page well imprinted on the memory, may prove more beneficial than hours spent in racing over it in a heedless manner.

Reading continually without reflection, is like traveling through the country on a rail road for the purpose of making investigations. By the time we get our eyes set upon some beautiful edifice, and begin to explore it, with the speed of the wind we leave it, while new ones as rapidly heave in view. So with those locomotive readers; they are nothing more than travelers over the fields of literature, or mere spectators, having only a superficial view, without enquiring into the cause and effect of what falls under their observation. The mind, like the body, when too much food is taken into the stomach, causes indigestion and pain. So with our intellect; if too much is crowded upon it at a time becomes weary, and if heavy tasks be continually imposed on it, while overborne its consequence must prove deleterious.

In the first place we should be careful to select such matter for reading as is worthy of our attention, that our minds may not be encumbered with superfluities. Peruse no more at a time than we can contain in our minds; that is, the substance of it.—Those small portions of our time which we are too apt to consider of little or no consequence, might prove most beneficial to us if spent in reading. Having small portions upon our minds at a time, we are able to investigate what we read more fully;—but where page upon page is forced through our minds in succession, we not only forget it, but it proves to be time thrown away.

Finally, let one read often, and understand what he reads, and he will seldom fail of being an intelligent and useful person.

RELIGIOUS.

From the Episcopal Recorder.

I AM WEARY.

I am weary of straying—O fain would I rest
In that far distant land of the pure and the blest,
Where sin can no longer her blandishments spread,
And tears and temptations forever are fled.

I am weary of hoping—where hope is untrue,
As fair, but as fleeting, as morning's bright dew:
I long for that land whose blest promise alone,
Is changeless and sure as eternity's throne.

I am weary of sighing—o'er sorrows of earth,
O'er joy's glowing visions, that fade at their birth;
O'er the pangs of the loved, which we cannot assuage,
O'er the blightings of youth, and the weakness of age.

I am weary of loving—what passes away—
The sweetest, the dearest, alas may not stay!
I long for that land where those partings are o'er,
And death and the tomb can divide hearts no more.

I am weary, my Savior! of grieving thy love;
O! when shall I rest in thy presence above:
I am weary—but O, let me never repine,
While thy word, and thy love, and thy promise are mine.

"DON'T FORGET TO PRAY."

Dr. Payson, writing to a kinsman, in an important crisis of religious experience, remarks:

"In your present situation, and for some time to come, your greatest difficulty will be, to maintain the daily performance of closet duties. On your maintaining that part, the fate of the whole battle will turn. This, your great adversary well knows. He knows that if he can beat you out of the closet, he shall have you in his power. You will be in the situation of an army cut off from supplies and reinforcements, and will be obliged either to capitulate, or to surrender at discretion. He will, therefore, leave no means untried to drive or draw you from the closet. And it will be hard work to maintain that post against him and your own heart. Sometimes he will probably assail you with more violence, when you attempt to read and pray, than at any other time; and thus try to persuade you that prayer is rather injurious than beneficial. At other times, he will withdraw and lie quiet, lest if he should distress you with his temptation, you might be driven to the throne of grace for help. If he can prevail on us to be careless and stupid, he will rarely distress us. He will not disturb a false peace, because it is a peace of which he is the author. But if he cannot succeed in lulling us asleep, he will do all to distress us. And when he is permitted to do this, and the Holy Spirit withdraws his sensible aid and consolations, when, though we cry and shout, God seems to shut out our prayers,—it is by no means easy to be constant in secret duties. Indeed, it is always most difficult to attend to them when they are most necessary. But never mind, your Lord and Master is looking on. He notices, he accepts, and he will reward every struggle. Besides, in the Christian warfare, to maintain the conflict, is to gain the victory. The promise is made to him that endures to the end. The object of our spiritual adversaries, then, is to prevent us from enduring to the end. If they fail of effecting this object, they are defeated. Every day in which you are preserved from going back, they sustain a defeat. And if, by praying yesterday you gained strength enough to pray to-day, and if, by praying to-day, you gain strength to pray again tomorrow, you have cause for thankfulness.—If the food which you take every day nourishes you for one day, you are satisfied.—You do not expect that the food you ate yesterday will nourish you to-day. Do you complain, then, if you find it necessary to ask every day fresh supplies of spiritual nourishment, and do not think your prayers are unanswered, so long as you are enabled to struggle on, even though it should be with pain and difficulty. Every day I see more clearly how great a mercy it is to be kept from open sin and from complete apostacy. If you are thus to be kept, be thankful for it."

WE MUST OBEY GOD RATHER THAN MAN.

When the Rev. Mr. Braid was pleading the cause of France a few days since in the Centre Church New Haven, Ct. he related the following which he received from the lips of one of the Evangelists employed by the Missionary Society of Paris.—This Evangelist was preaching in one of the towns of France, and a lady the wife of one of the wealthier citizens attended at the chapel, and became deeply interested in the subject of her soul's salvation. Her husband, who was an infidel, opposed her violently, and at length, when she became a decided Christian, told her that if she went to the chapel again he would take her life. Knowing well the character of the man, and firmly believing that he would execute his threat, she called on the minister to ask his advice. I know not, said he, what to give, but we will pray to God for wisdom. They kneeled and prayed together. She rose from her knees, and without saying a word returned home. The next Sabbath she was found at the house of God, listening as if for the last time on this side of the eternal world. At the close of the service she returned, and upon entering her house her husband met her, when the following conversation ensued. Have you been to the chapel? Yes. Did I not tell you that I would kill you if you went again? How dared you to go? Yes, but we must obey God rather than man. Perceiving that he hesitated, she embraced the opportunity of expostulating with him. Why, said she, do you intend to kill me? Have I been a worse wife to you—a worse mother to your children, since I became a Christian? No, replied he, letting his weapon fall from his hand, no, and I promise never to oppose [illegible] you any more. And now, comm[illegible] wish you to pray for me. The[illegible] fore the mercy seat and she po[illegible] soul in prayer for him. He [illegible] the most active members of [illegible] New Haven Recorder.

MEDITATION A MEANS O[illegible] REVIVALS

The closet is the first p[illegible] tion for the labors of a revi[illegible] et is a place of prayer; but [illegible] ceded, and followed, and promp[illegible] itation. Meditation is the p[illegible] closet. It is the voice of reason [illegible] conscience, preaching to the heart. Meditation makes the heart burn, and awakens an eager thirst for holy action, and inspires reliance on God through all the soul. Meditation produces repentance and holy indignation against sin, and humbleness of mind. Meditation guides to communion with God, promotes a sweet intercourse with heaven, overcomes the depression of earthly wo, and qualifies for conflict with the world, the flesh, and the tempter.

Christians in the closet should meditate upon many a holy text—upon the soul and its eternity, and its redeeming God. They should meditate upon the offers of mercy, and human depravity resisting, and Divine grace subduing, and the glory of God resulting.

They should meditate upon their relations to God, to mankind, to each other, and to their domestic circles—upon their duties springing from them—upon the immeasurable interests connected with them.

To the closet, to the study, to the work of meditation, go first then, O Christian, daily! There let the day begin; there let the midst of the day be fastened; there let the end of the day be spent.

Begin this work, O slumbering Christian, to-day! Begin it, O zealous Christian, with augmented vigor! It will keep thy zeal pure, and warm, and wise.

Pray with meditation. Action thence originating, will be blessed, because it will grasp the promises and flow forth beneath the conquering agency of God.—N. Y. Evangelist.

FROZEN TOGETHER.—A clergyman was one day sitting in his study when a friend from a distant town, a plain unlettered and simple minded man, called on him. It was natural to ask how they were getting along in the region from which his friend had come, and among other enquiries, he said to him, "Are you all united in the church at C——." "Yes," was the reply, "we are all frozen together." This answer defines the position and circumstances of too many churches. Union is indeed desirable. But that unity is death that results from spiritual stupidity; union that exists only where all are willing to lie down and let souls perish around them without prayer or effort for their salvation.

A Unitarian clergyman at Portsmouth, in a sermon recently delivered and published, compares a church not awake, while others around are enjoying a revival, to a "mountain of ice in a sea of fire." The comparison is bold and striking. But the fire of the Holy Spirit can melt that mountain and dissolve the icy bonds that unite that church. Winter hath a Spring. Death itself is followed by the Resurrection. Let the winter that reigns in the cold heart of the unawakened yield to the genial rays of the sun of righteousness. Let the spiritual sleep of the church be shaken off and a reviving Spring revisit the length and breadth of the land.

FOR THE MINISTER.

SUCCESSFUL PREACHING.

In the March number of the London Congregational Magazine, the question is discussed by a correspondent, "What kind of preaching is most likely to prove successful?" When so much is attempted, as at the present day, to bring the world to Christ, and when it is acknowledged on all hands, that by the foolishness of preaching men are to be saved, it is important to learn, How shall the truth be preached that it may become effectual to the salvation of souls? Could we hear Paul as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and a judgment to come, till Felix trembled; could we hear the eloquent Apollos, or rather, could we hear one sermon from him who "spake as never man spake," we should have a model of preaching that ministers would do well to imitate. But God has committed his gospel to feeble men that the power may appear to be of Him. And the feebler the instrument is, the more important that whatever power he does possess should be employed to the best advantage.

The article alluded to above, gives the following as properties of which preaching should partake to accomplish its object.—The enumeration is by no means complete, but is good as far as it goes. It should embrace some characteristics not here defined, before it would meet our views of the perfection of pulpit eloquence.—N. Y. Obs.

1. Let it be intelligent. The human mind is interested by exercise. It is wearied and pained by inactivity. Tiresome as it is to have nothing to think about, under ordinary circumstances, it is peculiarly vexatious to listen to an individual who assumes the office of a public teacher, but who has no more to communicate than the generality of his hearers already know. The least informed can appreciate sound instruction: and nothing will rivet the attention of an audience which is not superior to th[illegible] own resources.

[illegible] Preaching should be plain. The [illegible] of the speaker should always be [illegible] The human mind does not ob[illegible]—but it is excessively an[illegible] compelled to pursue a cir[illegible] when a straight path would [illegible] same point. Let an individual [illegible] and he will necessarily speak [illegible]fusion in language is the re[illegible] of thought, and this in a [illegible] is wholly unpardonable.

[illegible] preaching be affectionate. Eve[illegible] should be satisfied of the [illegible] disposition of the speaker. List[illegible] is a voluntary act—and an act of respect. Such an act will never be rendered in return to magisterial dictation, or unfeeling censure. Faithfulness is acceptable to a member of an assembly, however galling, when applied personally. But faithful admonition should be baptized with the tears of affection. When compelled to blame, the speaker should administer reproof, "even weeping." Let an audience be persuaded of the benevolent disposition of their instructor, and their favorable feelings will be awakened; defects will be forgotten, and appeals will be clothed with all the additional force that sympathy can convey.

4. Preaching should be animated. Excitement is the natural effect of addressing a multitude, and hence is always expected by the hearer. A religious assembly still further anticipates an animated delivery on account of the stirring nature of the truths delivered, and the momentous consequences attendant upon the reception they gain. Hence the want of animation in a preacher is generally traced to a defect in Christian principle. Such an exhibition must have the most repulsive effect upon the audience. An animated delivery, on the other hand, awakens sympathy, and by affording an evidence of the sincerity of the speaker, establishes confidence and produces that serious attention which is the first step to a cheerful acceptance of the truth.

5. Let preaching be natural. From the days of the schoolmen, down to the present time, sermonizing has been sadly too artificial. We are apt to regard the habit of taking a text, and screwing out of it a set number of leading heads and subordinate particulars, each of which is to be scrupulously attended by a very appropriate quotation from Scripture or Dr. Watts, as the only authorized mode of calling sinners to repentance. But this custom is, after all, a modern invention. We meet with only one occasion in which Christ selected a text; and even that was chosen in order that he might, at that very time, fulfil the prediction that it contained.

6. Let preaching be as diversified as possible. This rule applies both to the matter and the manner of our public addresses.

7. Preaching should be applicable. Religion is adapted to man. In this perfectly consists its essential charm. Preachers must so exhibit its truths as to make them fitted to the identical character and the present circumstances of their hearers.

8. Preaching should be applicatory. Disquisitions never interest hearers compared with direct appeals; and the pronoun they falls with a very different effect from the pronoun you. Let the sermon be applicatory throughout.

9. Sermons should be short. As soon as attention begins to flag, the speaker has lost his opportunity of producing salutary impressions. Long sermons are generally the least studied. They generally exhibit a sort of compromise with conscience.—Length is given to make up for the omission of strength; and the use of the lungs is too often judged to be fair compensation for the sluggishness of the brain.

10. Preaching should be richly scriptural. The generality of hearers are either well versed in scripture, or quite disposed to yield to the implicit deference. One passage of the word of God tells upon a professedly Christian audience more powerfully than twenty arguments drawn from other sources. Besides, the words of the Spirit are more likely to be favored with the blessing of the Spirit.

11. Preaching cannot be too practical. Practice is the end to be aimed at, and nothing strikes an audience as more worthy of their attention than what is to regulate their conduct and secure their everlasting felicity.

12. Preaching should be eminently evangelical. No doctrines can be compared, in their effect on the human mind, to the doctrines of the cross. They have been sufficiently proved to be "the power of God unto salvation." Evangelical preaching, cæteris paribus, uniformly attracts the largest congregations, and is the only exhibition of truth which God honors by conversion.

It has been observed by some eminent divines, that ministers are seldom honored with much success, unless they are continually aiming at the conversion of sinners.—Dr. Owen.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

CONVERSION OF YOUNG WOMEN.

MR. EDITOR:—A correspondent of last week, in remarking upon the interesting and encouraging revival statistics, recently published in your paper, from which he concludes that an unusual number of heads of families has been gathered into the fold of the Great Shepherd—observes, "one additional item would have made the account more satisfactory and complete," and ask, "How many of those admitted to the churches were young men?" Allow a correspondent of this week to suggest the addition of another item. How many were young women?

Admitting that the general influence of young men upon society is very great, and that the stations they are called to fill are predominantly eligible, and responsible; yet hath not God also put honor upon the weaker vessel? Hath he not made woman the centre and sun of the domestic circle, and made her influence to operate powerfully upon all the relations of life? To whom do some of the brightest stars in the horizon of Zion, owe their first coruscations of spiritual light; and many too who have gone up to blaze in the firmament of glory; to whom are they indebted for much of their resplendence? Is it not to woman—the meek retired woman, who has sat at the feet of Jesus, and there learned lessons to communicate to the sons and daughters God hath bidden her train for him? Is not the conversion of young women equally desirable with that of young men? Do we not need the winning, attractive powers of woman sanctified? Do we not need her influence, hallowed by piety, that we may not wait for the conversion of young men, but see her children, in their infancy, honoring her who bare them, as the instrument of their early introduction into the family of God? Were every young mother led by the Spirit to faithful and judicious efforts, and importunate and persevering prayer, for the souls of her children; were she prepared by the grace of God, early to present religious truth to the mind of her child, so as to awaken its moral sensibilities, and attract not only its attention, but its affections toward divine things, who can tell the effect upon the interests of the church? Would not these young plants, under the skilful training of such a gardener, who began in their greenness, and immaturity, to rear them for their Lord and Master, grow up to beautify Mount Zion, and become meet pillars for the temple of the Lord of Hosts?

Would that more interest was felt for this class of community! A mother without religion, with no just sense of her awful responsibilities; how affecting, how painful the reflection! and yet I have observed even in the meeting of the Maternal Association, the mother advanced in years, with a family of young men and women about her, asking special prayer for her sons, seeking counsel of her Christian sisters in reference to her sons, and seeming in her absorbing desire for their salvation, almost to forget that her daughters were to fill arduous and responsible stations, and that without piety they would be illy qualified for the office of wife and mother.

I know there are reasons why it should be so, and again, reasons why it should not be so. Let the impartial Christian mother judge. "What do we want in France," said Napoleon, "to insure to our children the best possible education?" "We want mothers, sire," was the answer, and an answer worthy of the celebrated Madame Campan. She meant mothers emphatically, those who would exemplify the character, and not disgrace the name. And what do we want in our American Zion, that her breaches may be repaired, her waste places cultivated, and her bulwarks strengthened? We want mothers—faithful, devoted, Christian mothers. Then shall our sons, led by such guides, and instructed by such wisdom, "be as plants grown up in their youth, and our daughters, as corner stones, polished after the similitude of a palace." C. M. S.

ANGER HINDERS PRAYER.

Anger is a perfect alienation of the mind from prayer, and therefore is contrary to that attention, which presents our prayers in a right line to God. For so have I seen a lark rising from its bed of grass, and soaring upwards, singing as he rises, and hopes to get to heaven, and climb above the clouds; but the poor bird was beaten back with the loud sighings of an eastern wind, and his motion made irregular and inconstant, descending more at every breath of the tempest, than it could recover by the vibration and frequent weighing of his wings, till the little creature was forced to sit down and pant, and stay till the storm was over; and then it made a prosperous flight, and did rise and sing, as if it had learned music and motion from an angel, as he passed sometimes through the air, about his ministries here below:—so is the prayer of a good man: when his affairs have required business, and his business was matter of discipline, and his discipline was to pass upon a sinning person, or had a design of charity, his duty met with infirmities of a man, and anger was its instrument, and the instrument became stronger than the prime agent, and raised a tempest and overruled the man; and then his prayer was broken, and his thoughts were troubled, and his words sent up towards a cloud, and his thoughts pulled them back again, and made them without intention; and the good man sighs for his infirmity, but must be content to lose the prayer; and he must recover it when his anger is removed, and his spirit is becalmed, made even as the brow of Jesus, and smooth like the heart of God; and then it ascends to heaven upon the wings of the holy dove, and dwells with God, till it returns, like the useful bee, loaded with a blessing and the dew of heaven.—Bishop Jeremy Taylor.

I do not like to hear professors using vain and unmeaning by-words; it sinks their dignity and influence.

"BUT THOMAS WAS NOT THERE."

The manner in which old Mr. Morris, an aged New England clergyman, illustrated some topics, is shown in the following extract from an article in the Lady's Book written by Mrs. H. B. Stowe:—

Sometimes he would give the narrative an exceedingly practical turn, as one example will illustrate.

He had noticed a falling off in his little circle which met together for social prayer; and took occasion, the first time he collected a tolerable audience, to tell concerning the "conference meeting which the disciples attended," after the resurrection.

"But Thomas was not with them," said the old man, in a sorrowful voice. "Why, what could keep Thomas away?" "Perhaps," said he glancing at some of the backward auditors, "Thomas has got cold-hearted, and was afraid they would ask him to make the first prayer; or, perhaps," said he, looking at some of the farmers, "Thomas was afraid the roads were bad; or, perhaps," he added, after a pause, "Thomas has got proud, and thought he could not come in his old clothes." Thus he went on; and significantly summing up, with great simplicity and emotion, he added, "but only think what Thomas lost, for in the middle of the meeting the Lord Jesus came and stood among them? How sorry Thomas must have been." This representation served to fill the vacant seats for some time to come.

CHRISTIANITY.—Wherever Christianity goes, civilization follows in her train; wherever she goes, the duties and rights of mankind are practiced and recognized, the fetters of the slave are lightened and removed, and the female sex are restored to their natural station and their kindly influence in society, and the profession of godliness is shown to be great riches, as contributing to the wisdom, the wealth, the happiness, of a nation which receives it.—Let us compare our present condition with that of our forefathers, while the gospel was yet unknown to them! Let us recollect that the poorest man who now hears me, is more warmly clad, more comfortably lodged, enjoys a mind better stored with ideas, and greater security of liberty, life, property, than a king among the wild Americans or the ancient Britons; and we shall feel and understand the blessings of a religion which has been a principal agent in a change so beneficial, a religion by which the ignorance of man has been enlightened, and his manners rendered gentle, which, by protecting the fruits of industry, has encouraged every useful invention, and which, even amid the luxury of the rich, has lessened the distance between them and the poor, by calling the attention of both to that awful moment when all shall be equal in each other's eyes, as they now are in the eyes of their Maker!—Bishop Heber.

GEMS FOR MINISTERS.

For a person to leave public worship in raptures with the minister's abilities, is no proof that he has received spiritual benefit. —A. Booth.

Preachers, by making light of common truths, and indulging in a spirit of curious speculation, will render preaching rather an entertainment than a benefit to the soul.—A. Fuller.

Keep not your religion for the pulpit; have it at heart and at hand, at dinner and at tea, and let every occurrence furnish you with a subject for spiritual improvement.—Cor. Winter.

The Puritans visited their flocks by house-row; the visits were short; they talked a little for God, & then concluded with prayer to God.—Berridge.

The sacred ministry is not a state of idleness or of pleasure, but a holy warfare, in which there are always toils and fatigues to be endured. Whoever is not resolved courageously to maintain the interests of Christ and to labor continually to enlarge his kingdom, is not fit for this warfare.—Quesnel.

You are shepherds, and must know all your sheep, and what is their disease, and mark their strayings, and help to cure them, and fetch them home.—Baxter.

Let us speak to our people as for their lives.—Ib.

SPIRIT OF PRAYER.—Prayer is not a smooth expression nor a well contrived form of words; not the product of a ready memory, or of a rich invention exerting itself in the performance. These may draw a neat picture of it, but still the life is wanting. The motion of the heart God-wards, holy and divine affection, makes prayer real and lively and acceptable to the living God, to whom it is presented; the pouring out of thy heart to him who made it, and therefore hears it; and understands what it speaks, and how it is moved and affected in calling on him. It is not the gilded paper and good writing of a petition that prevails with a king, but the moving sense of it. And to that King who discerns the heart, heart-sense is the sense of all, and that which only he regards. He listens to hear what that speaks, and takes all as nothing where that is silent. All other excellence in prayer is but the outside and fashion of it; this is the life of it.—Leighton.

THINGS I DO NOT LIKE.—I do not like to hear professors speak evil of one another.

I do not like to see professors of religion going from house to house on the sabbath for the sake of pastime.

I do not like to hear parents in the presence of their rising families, speak in degrading terms of religious persons, because it most always makes bad impressions concerning religion; they set a low price upon it.

I do not like to see brethren watching for each others' haltings and imperfections when they should be praying for them, and thus promote their spiritual welfare.—Cross and Journal.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, May 12, 1840.

Mr. GEORGE P. MAXSON is a traveling agent for this paper.

REV. JOHN WATSON.

We have to announce to our readers this week the death of our amiable and worthy Brother, JOHN WATSON. For the particulars of his sickness and death, we refer the reader to the article in another column furnished us by our brother and correspondent, Rev. W. B. Gillett.

Our former connections with brother Watson, associated as we once were in the field of Missionary effort in Western New-York, and the exalted views we have for a number of years entertained of his piety and talents as a christian and a minister, will not permit us on this occasion, without doing injustice to our feelings, to withhold our tribute of respect to the memory of departed worth.

Brother Watson, as a christian, was mild and affable in his manners, solemn and reserved in his deportment, modest in his pretensions, and, though a man of strong and elevated mind, yet for no trait in his character was he more remarkable than for that of meekness.

As a minister he was a profound theologian. His strong mind, close application to study, and reliance upon God, eminently fitted him for the performance of the high and responsible duties of his office. As an expounder of the word of God he had few equals. Every lover of good preaching who heard him, could not fail to be delighted with his peculiar and happy method of dividing his subject and arranging his thoughts so that every new idea expressed, forcible and clear in itself, would give additional force and clearness to that which preceded it. He never preached without system, nor failed to instruct his audience who favored him with their attention.

The infirmities of his body, which for the last few years of his life prevented him from active services in the vineyard of the Lord, only served to render more conspicuous those excellent traits of christian character which adorn the lives of all the faithful in Christ Jesus.

The remembrance of brother Watson will long be cherished in the hearts of his brethren.

MORNING PRAYER MEETINGS.

To sustain prayer meetings at sun-rise, would have a powerful tendency to extend, perpetuate, and multiply the revivals with which our land is now favored. Those who spend an early hour of the morning in a prayer meeting, find themselves invigorated by their exercise for the varied duties of the day. It helps them to realize the worth of the soul, and assists them to watch to win souls to Christ. The other members of the church feel the influence. If such a meeting is sustained in any village, the fact that it is sustained, preaches loudly to all the inhabitants. It is of itself a solemn warning to sinners. Inquirers cannot easily relapse into stupidity, when the people of God visit the sanctuary every morning, to pray for the out-pouring of the Holy Spirit.

In a country village, the influence of a sun-rise prayer meeting is, perhaps, more powerfully felt than "in the city full."—In our villages much sympathy exists among the inhabitants; they know each other's affairs, and plans, and transactions, and hence a morning prayer meeting will constitute a daily event of interest to all.

The writer was once in a church meeting where several persons were examined as candidates for admission into the church. After the examination was closed, one elderly man, who was not a member of the church, was asked to express his feelings. He said he sometimes hoped that he had found the Savior, but his hope was not so confirmed that he could venture to ask for admission to the church. But he assured them that although he lived three miles from the village, he took great interest in the morning prayer meetings which they were sustaining, "for," said he, "I observe the season at home, and thus meet with you at the throne of grace." Wherever such meetings are attended, all the praying ones who cannot be present, should spend some portion of that time in their closets; if they cannot be "in one place," yet let them be "of one accord."

Sun-rise prayer meetings throughout our country—how they would strengthen Zion! They may be sustained as permanent meetings. Where ten, fifteen, or twenty families are situated so as to meet at some central point, at least one from each family may find it consistent to attend each morning, and the meeting can be sustained from the first of January to the last of December. Only let hearts be warm and it is easy. The morning meetings which have been attended for two or three weeks past in this village, have been precious seasons to some, and, designing to continue them, we invite all to attend.

THE LADIES' COMPANION.—The April No. of this splendid Magazine is before us. From the attention we have been able to give it, we believe the present is not inferior to any former number. The work is entirely original, and is 'done up' with neatness and good taste. Among its varied contents, we notice "The Young Mother," illustrated by a beautiful engraving; "Fortune-Hunting; or, the Heiress," by Mrs. EMMA C. EMBURY; "The Queen's Vow; a Tale of Elizabeth," by Mrs. ANN S. STEPHENS; "The Price of a Heart; a Domestic Tale," by HENRY F. HARRINGTON.

Poetry.—"Time's Oration," by ALBERT PIKE.; "Lines to a Young Lady, an orphan, embarking for Europe to join her sister," by C. C. PISE, D. D. "The Cross before the Crown," by W. C. R. "The Poet's Books," by Mrs. LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY.

Literary Review.—"Universal History," by Harper & Brothers; "Life of Harrison," by L. W. Ransom; "The Path Finder," Lea & Blanchard; "Pilgrimage to Jerusalem," Carey & Hart.

We purpose to extract freely from this work in future.

Terms.—The terms of the Ladie's Companion are, THREE DOLLARS per annum, in advance, or FOUR DOLLARS during the year.

We take the following extract from a private letter from a valued friend; and although it was not designed for the public eye, yet its pertinency induces us to give it an insertion in our columns:

"I have read the numbers of your paper which I have received with much interest, and think it must do good, in disseminating important religious truths, dissipating error, and enlarging the sphere of christian knowledge. If the influence and responsibility of such a Press is great, those who conduct it need in the same degree the aid and encouragement which the importance of the subject demands, and which I trust you will abundantly receive."

ENQUIRY.

MESSRS. EDITORS,—I have been much gratified to see in No. 9 of the Register a solution of the problem which has been previously proposed; but I should be pleased to make a few brief enquiries with respect to one or two things, which no doubt Mr. G. M. L. could explain.

First. I should rather question the hypothesis taken, viz: "Having found the no. of solid miles the earth contains, we will call it the surface of the hollow globe, because said surface is one mile thick."—Agreeable to this hypothesis, the hollow globe thus formed must contain as many sq. miles on the concave or interior surface as it does on the outer surface, because no allowance appears to be made for the convexity of the globe. It must be evident to every one that a globe can not be formed by placing cubic blocks by the side of each other; it would form one continued plane. Therefore, as the surface of the globe thus formed only contains as many sq. miles as there are no. of cubic miles in the solidity of the earth, it follows that when said no. of cubic miles are formed into a globe of the given surface, there must be a certain allowance made for the portion which must be taken off of each in order to form them into a sphere; otherwise the contents of the crust thus formed would not be equal to the contents of the globe from which it was formed. While taking this view of it, the most abstruse part of the question appears to remain undemonstrated by mathematical principles. Therefore, believing the question unsolved, according to my understanding of the solution given, I have been induced to make this enquiry. But I would not presume to question the correctness of the solution, allowing the hypothesis taken to be true. I. O. U.

THE RISE AND PROGRESS OF RIVERS:

A MIRROR IN WHICH CAN BE SEEN THE LIFE OF MAN.

Its beginnings are insignificant, and its infancy is frivolous; it plays among the flowers of a meadow, it waters a garden, or turns a little mill. Gathering strength in its youth, it becomes wild and impetuous. Impatient of the restraints which it still meets with in the hollows among the mountains, it is restless and fretful; quick in its turning, and unsteady in its course. Now it is a roaring cataract, tearing up and overturning whatever opposes its progress, and it shoots headlong down from a rock; then it becomes a sullen and gloomy pool, buried in the bottom of a glen. Recovering breath by repose, it again dashes along, and leaves the opening of the valley strewed with the rejected waste. Now quitting its retirement, it comes abroad into the world, journeying with more prudence and discretion through cultivated fields, yielding to circumstances, and winding round what would trouble it to overwhelm or remove. It passes through the populous cities, and all the busy haunts of man, tendering its services on every side, and becomes the support and ornament of the country. Increased by numerous alliances, and advanced in its course, it becomes grave and stately in its motions; loves peace and quiet, and in majestic silence rolls on its mighty waters till it is laid to rest in the vast abyss. THE YOUTH WE MOST ESTEEM.

'Tis not the one whose boist'rous mirth
Disturbs our cogitation,
Who cannot find from day to day,
In virtue's bright and pleasant way,
Resource for consolation.

'Tis not the one whose parents kind
Have frequent cause for sorrow,
Because their child oft disobeys
Their just commands in various ways,
And pains them for the morrow.

'Tis not the one whose teacher grieves
To see his counsels slighted,
By that rude child who hates the truth,
Contemns example and reproof,
By whom fond hopes are blighted.

It is not these that cheer our hearts
With joys we love to mention—
It is the one—too seldom seen—
It is the one whose very mien
Bespeaks his good intention.

FROM PERSUASIVES TO EARLY PIETY.

If to love God above all things is the first and greatest commandment, to live negligent of Him must be one of the greatest of sins, and indeed a sin that opens the way to every other. O my young friend, could we see things aright, every other sin so far as it refered to man only, would dwindle into comparative innocence, compared with neglect of the blessed Savior and our adorable God! The blackness of every other crime would be as light, compared with the more horrible blackness of alienation of the heart from God, that first of sins, that root of every other. This has been mine, this has been yours! And unless your heart be changed by divine grace, even at this moment this sin is yours. Though unstained with the other dark offences of the robber or the adulterer, yet this blackest of all, you have as well as they. Like them you belong to a false apostate-race, that have forsaken their God, and gone away backward. And how can you hope for heaven, if this darkest of crimes remains unrepented and unforsaken?

Perhaps a familiar illustration may render this subject still plainer. Imagine two favored villages under a kind and beneficent government, uniting in a cruel and unprovoked rebellion. The inhabitants of one of these villages are profane, contentious, quarrelsome wretches; those of the other are decent, quiet, sober men; careless of threatnings and unmoved by kindness they persist in their rebellion.

In the former village discord, blasphemy, and every sin abound; in the other, harmony, and mutual affection prevail. Now, my young friend, if the inhabitants of these two places were brought to trial for their crimes at the same bar, would there appear much difference between them? Would they not all be rebels? Would not the same doom justly await them all? And if the quiet villagers were to plead in their own defense; that though it was true, they had engaged in an unprincipled and ungrateful rebellion; yet that they were kind, affectionate and useful to each other; would not this very circumstance be an aggravation of their guilt? Might it not be answered, "Among such disorderly wretches as those, rebellion was likely to happen; but from you better things might have been expected." Apply this to the present subject. The openly wicked and profane resemble the former of these; the moral and benevolent, that yet neglect Religion, may be compared to the latter. In many things they differ; but agree in the worst, that they have rebelled against their greatest and best Benefactor. Are not you, by neglect and disobedience, a rebel against your God? Have not you at least by a careless life said to him, "Depart from me, for I desire not the knowledge of thy ways?" Have you not lived as without God in the world? So that if there had been no God, you probably could hardly have been more forgetful of Him than you have frequently been? Has not this been the case? and if it has will it avail for you at the last to plead, that you have been kind, tender, useful, and beloved among your fellow rebels?

INTELLIGENCE.

Late and Important from Campeachy.—Capt. Blunt, of the Aurea, which arrived yesterday from Campeachy and Sisal, states that on the night of the 22d of March, the Federal brig Fame arrived at Sisal from Campeachy, with the Mexican brig Privado, recently arrived at that place with provisions from Vera Cruz. The Fame had also captured the schooner Artevido of Campeachy, which had just discharged a cargo of flour from New-Orleans, and had armed her to cruise off Campeachy. The schooner Correo had also arrived at Sisal, and was given up to the Federalist by her crew, who ran away with her from Campeachy, while the officers were on shore.

Capt. Blunt also states that the Federal army, 5,000 strong, from Merida, was within two leagues of Campeachy, and little doubt was entertained that they would succeed in capturing the place, as the inhabitants as well as the garrison were very short of provisions. Flour was only $35 a barrel, and all who could not provide two months' provisions were ordered to leave the place.

The Federal army was deficient in heavy cannon, but they expected to accomplish their object by starving out the garrison.—A reinforcement of 700 men from Merida were on their march to Campeachy, to join the invaders.

The Fame and Correo were cruising off Campeachy to intercept provisions, and had taken two Spanish schooners from Havana and taken them to Sisal. A British ship with 300 Mexican troops from Vera Cruz, succeeded in landing them at Campeachy on the 16th of March.

A Noble Deed, worthy the Governor of a State.—At the late State Temperance Convention in Illinois, Gov. Duncan, president of the Convention took a pen and wrote an order on the Auditor of the State, for five hundred dollars; being the amount of his salary as Governor of the State, for the last half year, and put it into the hands of the executive committee; at the same time expressing his most ardent desire that the plans of the committee should be carried out. This is truly having "kings for nursing fathers," and is an act beyond all praise. Mobile Chronicle.

Fire in Rome.—The destruction occasioned by the late fire at the Roman College in Rome, was much more extensive than was at first supposed. Three hundred and seventy manuscripts were burnt. Among these were 27 Arabic, 43 Persian, 9 Armenian, a large collection of Hindoo and Chinese Drama; all of which were unpublished, and of which it is believed, there are no copies existing in Europe. The number of printed books lost in the flames has not been ascertained; but about 1,500 volumes of the earliest eras of printing are gone; and the invaluable collection of Greek and Latin Classics, bequeathed to the College by the great Philologist, Muretus, who died in 1585, with whose autographical notes most of the margins of their pages are enriched.

A Novel Affair.—A few days since a gentleman riding in the west part of this town, reined his horse up to a boy who was standing in front of a house, and offered him a pocket book. The boy not understanding the design of the stranger, and taken by surprise, refused to accept it; when the stranger threw it into the street, by the boy and rode off. The pocket book was taken into the house, opened and examined, and was found to contain two hundred and three dollars in bills of the Hartford Bank. There was also a slip of paper attached to the roll of money, on which was written with a pencil: "Give this money to Miss ——." The name was that of a young lady who has been for some years partially deranged, and who has lived in dependent circumstances. The whole affair is singular, and a part very foolish; for if the donor wished to make his present without exposing his generosity, he might have adopted some more sure method of a safe conveyance.—Hartford Review.

The Hudson River has become a race ground. Every day, trials of speed take place, and many of the boats run up and down the river without landing, to the great annoyance of hundreds who are waiting on the docks at intermediate places for a passage. On board of the contending boats, the steam is kept up to such a height, that they seem to leap almost out of the water, trembling at every pore and straining every nerve, like an ambitious race-horse. An explosion seldom takes place during such a contest, because the closest attention is paid to the steam-guage. But if the machinery gives way at such a time, it's "hard coffee" for somebody. Some of the boats are running for fifty cents, and the river never had such a flood of cheap, yet elegant conveyances as at the present time.—Troy Mail.

ALBANY CIRCUIT.—Trial for Libel, John Taylor vs. Edward C. Delevan.—This trial commenced with the opening of the Court on Tuesday last, and continued, day and night, until Saturday evening, when the case was committed to the jury.

The case turned on the truth of an article, published by the defendant in Feb. 1835, charging the plantiff and others, with the use, for several years, of filthy and impure water in malting.

The examination of witnesses lasted from Tuesday until Friday night, and the summing up until Saturday evening.

The trial excited great interest, and the case was very ably managed by S. Stevens,

M. T. Reynolds, J. McKnown and J. Van Buren, Esquires, for the plantiff, and by S. Beardsley, A. Tabor, and H. G. Wheaton, Esqrs., for the defendant.

The jury, after a charge from the judge, retired, and yesterday morning, upon the opening of the court, came in with a sealed verdict for the defendant, with costs.—Argus.

FLORIDA.

Gen. Taylor is concentrating 300 men at Fort Fanning on the Suwanne, for an examination of the Wahoo Swamp.

From every thing which we can learn, from gentleman who have recently been among the enemy, the opinion seems to be a prevalent one, that they are short of powder. Among camps which they were forced to vacate, leaving every thing behind them, their horns were invariably found empty; and from the fact that Wild Cat did not fire upon the troops when re-crossing the We-ki-wa, these views seem to be strengthened. Now is a favorable moment to push up the feeling of insecurity, created among them by the late visit to their planting ground; and while their resources of ammunition are depreciating, cripple them in their efforts at resistance. Delay may be dangerous; for who shall say, that before this moon is over they will not successfully ambuscade a baggage train, and receive new supplies to keep up their blood-thirsty operations.

There is a rumor that the Indian made prisoner some time since on the Wacassa, took his captors to a place used as a depot by Tiger-Tail, and that several articles belonging to the late Mr. Dallam, murdered at Caloosahatepie, were identified by their marks. The prisoner also informed them that the Indians were supplied with powder by a Spaniard at Tampa Bay, and he was accordingly taken there, in order to point out the person spoken of.

Murder.—An inquest was held in Springville, on Thursday, over the burned remains of a farmer named Ransford Otis, of Concord, Erie county. The jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against Major Mc Ellory, for the offence, who was arrested and brought to this city yesterday for commitment.

McEllory was the hired man of the deceased. On Wednesday afternoon a controversy arose between the two, who were together at the barn, which resulted in the murder of Mr. Otis. Of the manner of his death, nothing is known, as the parties were alone.

Toward evening, McEllory returned to the dwelling, and upon Mrs. O. asking of her husband's whereabout, the accused made answer that he was in the barn. He seemed agitated, went out and shortly after the barn was in flames, caused no doubt by the hand of McEllory. The building was consumed, as was also partially the body of Mr. Otis.—Buffalo Commercial.

A Young Adventurer.—On Sunday evening, during the storm, a well dressed colored man, in passing along Spring street, near the Bowery, saw a very small colored boy, handsomely clad, and apparently not more than two or three years old, scudding along and evidently lost, and out of humanity took him to his house, kept him all night, and on Monday conducted him to the upper police office, and put him in charge of the presiding magistrate, who ordered him to be well taken care of. He was dressed in a little dark green frock, and pants of the same, and had on his head a figured velvet cap, with a projecting crown to it.—He said his name was Henry, but could tell no other name, nor where he lived. He is uncommonly sprightly, active and intelligent, and went round the office shaking hands with the officers and all who came in. It is hoped that this will meet the eye of his parents or guardians, that they may reclaim him.—Journal & Gazette.

An Affecting Scene.—A friend of ours informs us, that as he was crossing the Peekskill creek, north of this village, on Friday last, he saw an aged man, his wife and four small children, sitting by the road side, cooking their meal, which consisted of a few potatoes. In conversing with them, he learnt that their names were Bruce, and that they were travelling to New York, where their friends resided. On his return, he saw a crowd collected, and engaged in dragging the dead body of the old man from the water, who had fallen from the bridge a short time previous, as it was generally thought intoxicated. Our informant states, that it was heart rending to witness the tears and distress of the mother and six children. Another little girl, about five or six years of age, was running amongst the crowd, crying for its mother. On inquiring he understood it was the child of another woman, who was lying at the other end of the bridge very much intoxicated. We have not as yet been informed, what course has been taken in reference to the wretched woman and children, or the result of the Coroner's inquest, held on the body of the drowned man.—Peekskill (N. Y.) Democrat.

SUMMARY.

Several companies of U. S. troops passed through Boston a few days since, on their way to the state of Maine.

Longevity.—A slave died a short time since on the plantation of Lieut. Howe, aged 110 years. The evening previous to his death, he was in full possession of his physical and mental faculties. During the revolutionary war, he was present at the final siege of Yorktown. He saw Gen. Braddock as he passed on to his defeat, and could give a succinct account of that sanguinary engagement.

Emigration.—Within the last seven days, says the Empire State, there has arrived at the port of New York, two thousand one hundred emigrants from Europe, and we notice a large portion of them are Swiss, German and Dutch, and wear the aspect of a hardy industrious set of men.

Specie.—There were exported from London for Calais, (France) in one week in March, One Hundred and Twenty thousand dollars in silver.

Rev. Mr. Newton, one of the most distinguished Methodist preachers in England, is now in New York, on his way we presume to the General Conference. His preaching in New York is said to have been very eloquent, and to have produced a great sensation.

Accident.—A printer named Wetherbie was recently killed in New Orleans, by falling from the third story of the Bulletin office.

Rev. John T. Kirkland, for many years President of Harvard University, died in Boston on Monday week.

Dreadful Thunder Storm at Sea.—The sloop Whitmore, Capt. Warlington of N. Y., bound from Havanna to Savannah Geo., encountered a terrific thunder storm on the night of the 18th ult., when about fifty miles southeast of Tybee light. The ship was struck by lightning and somewhat damaged, but no lives lost. Rev. Mr. Genney, (we believe of the society of Friends) was on board at the time, and gives a thrilling description of the scene.

Isaac Sherwood, Esq., for many years one of the most enterprising stage proprietors in this state, died of dropsy at Auburn on the 24th ult., in the 72d year of his age.

Hiram Pratt, Esq., President of the Bank of Buffalo, and late Mayor of that city, died at Utica a few days since, while on his way to Saratoga Springs for the benefit of his health.

Virginia Election.—It is now believed by all parties that the Whigs have elected a majority of the Virginia Legislature; but the administration prints claim the state for Mr. Van Buren, at the coming Presidential election.

Historical Convention.—The celebration of the organization of the first constitution of Connecticut lately held at Hartford, was addressed by the venerable Noah Webster, L. L. D. now in his eighty-second year.—His mental faculties continue strong, and his voice firm. Among other venerable gentlemen present, were Col. Trumbull and Judge Daggett. The former was aid-de-camp to Gen. Washington in the revolutionary war.

Five Hundred Dollars Reward is offered to the police and citizens of New York by the partners of Mr. Jacob May, who is suspected to have been murdered in that city, for the detection and arrest of the murderers of said May. He had over $6000 in money and drafts in his possession.

The Common Council of the city of New York, have refused by an unanimous vote, to appropriate a portion of the Common School fund to the support of Catholic Schools, as such.

Accident.—On the 1st inst. two lads, sons of Mr. Hulbert of Fayetteville, while playing upon the bank of the basin of the Fayetteville branch of the canal, fell in, and the eldest, aged 11 years, was drowned.

FOREIGN.

From the N. Y. Eve. Post.

LATEST AND IMPORTANT FROM EUROPE.

The steam ship Great Western arrived at this port yesterday, in eighteen days from Bristol, bringing late news from England and all parts of the continent. We are indebted to the attention of Captain Hoskins for London papers of the 15th of April, which Capt. Hoskins was at great pains to bring by express from London to Bristol. The intelligence they bring, it will be perceived, is of more than usual interest.

In the House of Commons, on the 14th of April, Lord John Russell moved an address to Her Majesty for copies or extracts of correspondence relating to the boundary between British America, and the United States.

The day before, Sir Robert Peel enquired when the papers which he had moved for relative to the American boundary would be laid on the table of the house?

Lord J. Russell was understood to say that the papers would be laid upon the table of the house before the adjournment, which is all we find relating to the American Question.

The motion of Sir James Graham, condemning the course pursued by the whig ministers in their management of Canadian affairs, was lost in the House of Commons, after a debate of three days, by a majority of ten votes.

The corn law debate terminated on the 1st of April, without a division; and it was not anticipated that it would be revived again this session.

The Bishop of Exeter, on the 7th, brought forward his motion in the House of Lords respecting the Clergy Reserves of Canada, and concluded by moving a resolution annulling the recent act of the Canada Legislature which interfered with the Clergy Reserves. He carried his motion by a majority of 17—the division being 57 to 40.

A difficulty which has arisen between the King of Naples and the British Ambassador at that court, Mr. Temple, in regard to the Sulpher monopoly, has induced the latter to demand his passports, and order Admiral Spafford to bring before Naples and the Sicilian ports, a part of the British naval force in the Mediterranean. Every preparation was made for defence, and the King of Naples himself superintended the works he had ordered. In the fear that the first attack would be made against Sicily, 12,000 men had been sent thither, and all the merchant ships which chanced to be at the port of Naples were made use of to transport these troops.

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

At the Court at Buckingham Palace, May 3, 1840; present, the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Her Majesty having taken into consideration the late injurious proceedings of certain officers of the Emperor of China toward officers and subjects of her Majesty, and her Majesty having given orders that satisfaction and reparation for the same shall be demanded from the Chinese government; and it being expedient that, with a view to obtain such satisfaction and reparation, ships, and vessels and cargoes, belonging to the Emperor of China and his subjects, shall be detained and held in custody; and that if such reparation and satisfaction be refused by the Chinese government, the ships, and vessels and cargoes so detained, and others thereafter to be detained, shall be confiscated and sold, and that the proceeds thereof shall be applied in such a manner as her Majesty may be pleased to direct.

Her Majesty, therefore, is pleased by and with the advice of her privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the commanders of her Majesty's ships of war do detain and bring into port all ships, vessels and goods belonging to the Emperor of China, or his subjects, or other persons inhabiting within any of the countries, territories or dominions of China; and in the event of such reparation and satisfaction as aforesaid having been refused by the Chinese government, to bring the same to judgment in any of the courts of the Admiralty within Her Majesty's dominions; and to that end Her Majesty's Advocate General, with the Advocate of Admiralty, is immediately to prepare the draft of a commission, and present the same to Her Majesty at this board, authorising the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral, to will and require the High Court of Admiralty of Great Britain, as also the several courts of Admiralty within Her Majesty's dominions, to take cognizance of and judicially proceed upon all, and all manner of captures, prizes, and reprisals of all ships, vessels and goods, that are or shall be taken, and to hear and determine the same according to the courts of Admiralty, and the laws of nations, to adjudge and condemn all such ships, vessels and goods, as shall belong to China or subjects of the Emperor of China, or to any others inhabiting within any of his countries, territories or dominions; and that such powers and clauses be inserted in the said commission as have been usual and are according to former precedents; they are likewise to prepare and lay before Her Majesty at this board a draught of such instructions as may be proper to be sent to the courts of Admiralty in Her Majesty's foreign Governments and plantations for their guidance herein; and the said commissioners are to give the necessary instructions herein accordingly.

RUSSIA.

Accounts have been received from the Russian expedition to Chiva, which leave no doubt of its having failed from intense cold. These accounts were at first met by counter statements of the party which supports Russian interest in this city, but we have received subsequent intelligence which confirms the first. The thermometer fell to 32 deg. below zero of Reumur, which destroyed entire battalions of the soldiers who were suddenly carried off, after blood had poured out from the mouth and skin. The camels also died from the same cause, and the wretched remnant of the army was obliged to return. It is supposed that the expedition will be resumed in the summer.

The news from Circassia is equally unfavorable to the pretensions of Russia.—Twenty chiefs of tribes have united in one head, named Schamil. They have adopted the Arabic language in order to remove every wall of partition. Very recently they destroyed an entire Russian regiment which bore the name of Paskewitch.

Later from China.—The ship Levant, Capt. McDowell, arrived at Philadelphia on the 4th inst., bringing Canton papers of the 14th of Jan. which is several days later than the news received in England.—By this arrival we collect the following items of intelligence. The blockading of the river and port of Canton by the British fleet—the confirmation of the official acts of Lin, the high commissioner, by the Emperor, and the proclamation of an edict prohibiting all British trade with the Celestial Empire, and threatning summary vengeance on all foreigners who may hereafter be found interested in conveying British goods up the Canton river.

DIED,

In Livingston, Essex co., N. J., on the morning of the 30th ult., the Rev. JOHN WATSON, aged 52 years, after a protracted and painful illness of 16 weeks.

Brother Watson was born in Nottingham, England, in the year 1787, of pious parents, and members of the General Baptist Church. He emigrated to this country in early life, being only 17 years of age, (leaving his parents and friends behind, who have since emigrated,) and settled in the city of New York, where, at the age of 19, he embraced religion and became a member of the Gold Street Baptist Church, under the Pastoral charge of the Rev. Mr. Parkinson. While a member of this church, Br. Watson commenced his public improvement, and received license to preach. From this place he removed to Northfield, Essex co., N. J., and was ordained Pastor of the Baptist Church in that place, at the age of 27 years. Here Brother Watson labored as a minister successfully and satisfactorily for a number of years. From this, he removed to Mount Bethel, Somerset co., N. J., and became the Pastor of the Baptist Church in that place, where, as a minister, a christian, and a citizen, he was generally beloved. He labored with this church until the year 1826, when he became convinced that he had been deceived relative to the perpetuity and obligation of the fourth commandment, and renouncing his former views and practice on that subject, embraced the Sabbath of the Bible. From this church he received a letter of high commendation, and offered himself to become a member of the Seventh Day Baptist Church in Piscataway, N. J., where he was cordially received. With this church he labored as their minister for nearly two years, when he received an appointment to travel as a Missionary in Western New York. His devoted and arduous labors in that country, will not soon be forgotten. Soon after his labors as a Missionary ceased, he became much afflicted with deafness, and it was with difficulty that he could understand what was said in common conversation. About this time, he also became affected with the spinal disease, which at times disqualified him to travel, or stand sufficiently long to preach often. About this time he removed to Livingston, a distance of about 25 miles, but continued to supply the church monthly, until they obtained a Pastor, which was nearly two years. Two years since, he received and accepted a call to take the Editorial charge of the Protestant Sentinel, a religious paper, published at De Ruyter, Madison county, N. Y. About the time he was to enter on his labor as an Editor, he was attacked with a paralytical affection, so that he was unable to enter upon his work, since which time he was able to preach or labor but little. On the first of last January he fell and fractured one of his legs in such a manner, as to render it necessary for him to lie on his back for some length of time, which served to augment his spinal disease to such a degree as to render his sufferings intense and indescribable, yet he bore it all with Christian fortitude and resignation, frequently saying, "though he slay me yet will I trust in him." Of Br. Watson it truly may be said, "his house was set in order." For weeks he was anxiously waiting for the messenger of death to come and take him home that he might be with Christ. A neighboring Minister who visited him frequently during his sickness, observed to me that he seldom saw so decidedly the power of faith as he saw in the sickness and death of Br. Watson. He [illegible] this reason to the last—exhibiting that calmness that characterizes the devoted Christian. Thus died our beloved Brother in the Gospel. He was a man of studious habits, and possessed a penetrating mind. As a Minister, he was well read in Theology, and as a speaker in the desk, he was excelled by few. He was exemplary in his walk and conversation, and it can truly be said of him, he was a good man.

Br. Watson has left a wife and five children to mourn their loss.

His funeral was attended on the 14th, at his residence, by a large concourse of people. Preaching on the occasion by myself from Phillippians i. 21.: "For me to live is Christ; but to die is gain." His remains were buried in the family grave-yard near his dwelling. A discourse is to be preached on the occasion to the Church next Sabbath if the Lord will.

W. B. G.

New Market, April 20th, 1840.

In Leonardsville, on the 3d inst. Isaac Brown, sen. in the 68th year of his age. His sickness was painful, which he bore with patience for a little more than two weeks, and then fell asleep in Christ. Mr. Brown had for many years been a worthy member of the first S. D. B. Church of Brookfield. In his death his widow has lost a kind and faithful husband, his children an affectionate father, a large train of relatives a beloved friend, the church a useful member, and the community a valuable citizen. The Righteous hath hope in his death.

E. S. B.

In Brookfield, on the 26th ult. Mrs. Lucy Murphy, aged 47. She was a native of Stonington, Conn., whence she removed to Brookfield, N. Y. while a child, with her parents Asa and Thede Frink. At an early age, she was united in marriage with Martin Perry Murphy, after which she resided in various parts of this state, afterwards in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Virginia, until the death of her husband and eldest daughter, who were buried in Kentucky, 1823. Two years after, 1825, with four remaining children she was restored to the bosom of her friends in Brookfield, where the last 15 years of her life have been spent, in the enjoyment of that quiet rest which they can best appreciate who, like her, have experienced the toils and fatigues, the trials and privations, incident to a life of emigration.—Her widely scattered acquaintances will be happy to learn that "her end was peace." Her last sickness, which was very distressing and continued 15 days, she endured with that meek calmness which had characterized her previous life, and that sweet submission which enabled her to say continually, "The will of the Lord be done." To her numerous and deeply afflicted friends she has left the example of her pious life, and the blessed consolation that her death was that of the Righteous. Her funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. H. Turner, Pastor of the First Baptist Church in Brookfield, of which she was a member, from Ps. xxiii. 4: "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me, thy rod and thy staff shall comfort me."—Comm.

SPRING.

IN IMITATION OF THE GERMAN OF TIECK.

See, see how the Spring, like a glittering bride,
Comes forth on hills, in beauty and pride!
She flings o'er the forest her mantle of green,
Where the blossoming trees so gracefully lean;
And the bird in the branches in merry mood sings,
As he shakes the light drops of the dew from his wings,
See! see on the soft-blushing cheek of the flower,
The red glow grows deeper and deeper each hour;
The winter frost flies to his caverns so old,
Far down their chambers, all dismal and cold;
While old earth throws aside his gray robes to the rain,
That is falling so gently on river and plain,
And stretches in joy his broad arms to embrace
The light form of Spring, with her fair smiling face?

Down, down the rough mountains the silver streams leap,
And dance in the valleys so lonely and deep;
No longer the nightingale fears the rude blast,
But sings in the green-wood that winter is past;
Many a shadow grows bright in the beams
That sparkle and flash from the swift-rushing streams;
Many a leaf like a diamond gem,
Is waving in beauty on many a stem;
Rainbows are playing on many a flower,
As it lifts its thin petals, that drip with the shower;
And the earth, like a monarch majestic and old,
Sits high on a throne of purple and gold.

DESCENT OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

Days of revival! holiest, happiest, best,
Fair Zion shines in heavenly raiment drest;
Her sons awakened from their guilty sleep,
O'er all their sins, and o'er all sinners weep;
Warm to the throne of grace their prayers ascend,
Till, with the plans of God, they meet and blend;
Then Mercy smiles; their holy plea prevails,
And hell's dark Rebel at the answer quails.
On, on, the chariots of redemption roll,
Flashing eternal glory o'er the soul!
Where Vice long triumphed with her scorpion whip,
Where daring curses stained the festered lip,
Where the vile sot his liquid ruin quaffed,
Where Folly revelled, and where sceptics laughed,
Lo, crowds now throng Religion's sacred dome,
And build her altars, mid the joys of home;
Gay blooming youth, each sinful pleasure quit;
Hell's hardest veterans unto Christ submit;
Error lies prostrate at the feet of God,
And Bliss exults wherever they have trod;
Streams of salvation through the desert flow,
And on their banks perennial roses glow,
Truth and Delight shine out like orbs of even,
And Love, like sunlight, fills the vaults of heaven.

A HAPPY NEW-YEAR.

BY MRS. LYDIA JANE PEARSON.

'A happy New-Year, sweetest,' cried Charles Barton to his young wife, as he entered from the counting-room, to which he went before she was awake, to make some particular arrangement.

'Thank you, dear Charles,' she answered, clasping his neck with her round white arms; 'but then, how can one be happy who is tantalized by ungratified wishes?'

'What do you mean, dearest?' he replied, in a voice of surprise and solicitude; 'what wish have you ungratified?'

'O! do not be alarmed Charles; but if you really wish me a happy New-Year, you must make me happy, by giving me a New-Year's present.'

The husband was mute.

'I know,' she continued, 'that I have need of nothing, and yet there is something which I very much desire; and I think you will hardly refuse me on this first New-Year's day of our union. You know that Mrs. Ellis and I were rivals in our girlhood, and I do not like to see her outdo me in splendor and elegance. Well, when I called on her last week, I observed on her side-board, a rich and superb set of plate, and I long for a set which shall outshine it. Now do not look so grave. It will only cost a few hundreds, and we can economise a little in something else, if it be necessary.—Come, say yes; and let us go and order my magnificent set of plate.'

'It will hardly be possible for me to attend to you to-day, Charlotte, for I have some particular calls to make, in which, although I did not before mention it, I now request you will accompany me.'

'And we shall bespeak the plate to-morrow.'

'Yes, love, if you please,' replied Charles; 'and now be ready to go with me in an hour.'

'I wonder where he is a going to take me,' mused Charlotte, as she tied on her hat, and fastened her superb cloak. Charles took her hand with a smile, and they went into the sleigh. Their first call was at a magnificent mansion, the master of which met them in the hall with a hearty welcome, and led them into a parlor, furnished in a style of the most costly splendor beyond any thing that Mrs. Barton had ever seen. The library, too, was like an enchanted hall. Mr. Allen treated them with polite familiarity; and on their departure presented to the young bride as a New-Year's gift, a beautifully executed silver vase, crowned with an artificial rose bush, of enameled gold, emeralds and rubies; and breathing rich incense from the altar of roses with which it was enriched. She was enraptured with his courtesy and liberality. He had called on them several times, and his suavity and gentility of manner had won her esteem, but she had never dreamed of his being so immensely rich.

'Well Charlotte,' said Barton, as they drove away, 'how do you like my friend and his residence?'

'Oh! he is a gentleman, and his house is like a palace. But is it not strange that such a wealthy man should be so familiar with us?'

'Not at all, Charlotte. He was my most intimate friend in College, we were always competitors for the same prize, and the same honor. I won most frequently, and he was much richer than I, but no jealousy awoke between us. And now I do not envy him and he does not despise me. We always meet as friends; and what would you think of me, Charlotte, if I were to undertake to furnish my parlor and library like his?'

'I understand you, Charles, but then there is not so great an inequality between you and Mr. Ellis, as between Mr. Allen and you. But why stop here at the hospital?'

Barton did not answer, but assisting her from the sleigh led her trembling into the receptacle of misery. Stopping at a ward in which lay an emaciated female, he bade her be seated: and after some kind enquiries concerning the state of the invalid, introduced his wife, and besought the sufferer to tell who she was, and how she came there.

'It is a bitter trial,' commenced the woman, 'to recall all my errors, sins, and sufferings; but since I owe you so much, I will tell you all, in as few words as possible. Lady, in my youth I was called beautiful. I was a school mate of your husband's mother. I married first, and although she soon after united herself with a wealthier man than my equally respectable Horace, still she treated me with all the warmth of a sister's affection. But from the day of her marriage I felt an envy, the more criminal from its being unprovoked. We set up in a genteel style, my house being elegantly furnished; but still Mrs. Barton, although an unostentatious lady, had many brilliant articles that I had not. I could not rest. My husband was a prudent man, but unfortunately he loved me too well. I urged him with tears and all manner of persuasions, to purchase things which would outvie Mrs. Barton's establishment. He frequently warned me that we should be undone, yet he still complied with my extravagant demands. At length Mr. Barton having made a successful speculation, purchased a beautiful span of horses and a splendid carriage. I saw him drive past with his lady, and my soul was in agony until I forced a promise from my poor husband to purchase a similar equipage for me. As soon as I obtained it, I rode triumphantly to Mrs. Barton. She greeted me as I thought sorrowfully, and several times sighed as she looked sadly in my face. At length I enquired the cause of her uneasiness. 'My dear Ellen,' she commenced, 'you know that I love you sincerely, or I should not venture to say what I imagine it my duty to tell you. Your husband is an excellent and an honorable man; but you must be aware that he is considerably in debt. Now creditors, you know, exercise a kind of dictatorship over those that owe them; and it is natural for them to say, 'if Mr. ——— can afford his family such and such indulgencies, he might certainly pay me. Now your husband's creditors have long been grumbling at what they are pleased to call his extravagance, and I fear that when they see you in your carriage they will treat him without mercy. I am sorry that my husband went to the like unnecessary expense, for I much fear that you were prompted by emulation. Do not be offended,' she said soothingly, and extended her hand, but I drew back pettishly, and hurrying from the house regained my carriage, sunk back in it, and wept all the way home. I felt the truth of her words, but my pride rose against her; I was offended that she should be aware of my envy and emulation of her, and I vowed, come what would, never to speak to her again. But from that time the superfluous finery gave me a feeling of guilt and fear. And ruin soon came. My husband gave up all to our creditors, and we were without a home. In this hour of darkness Mrs. Barton came, and with words of consolation offered me a home with her, as long as I pleased. Would you believe that I haughtily repulsed her kindness, although I had not where to lay my head? My husband knew not of her proffer; for I had taught him to believe that she had grossly insulted me, and spoken injuriously of him. He hired a room and we removed. But he was broken-hearted. He fell violently sick, and actual want took hold on me. At this time a gentleman of our acquaintance called upon us, and with great delicacy relieved our necessities. But my husband died. Our friend took me to his house. Alas! that the noblest feelings of our nature are so nearly allied to sin. His generous pity and my gratitude, grew together into a guilty passion. Shall I say on? I was lost. I sunk deeper and deeper in infamy, until your husband found me dying in the street. He brought me hither. I shall soon die. But he bids me hope that the pure God will, for Jesus' sake, show mercy even unto me.'

Barton thanked the weeping penitent, and with his wife took his departure.

Charlotte felt the whole force of her husband's silent admonition. She was grieved, but as she looked into her own spirit she could not but confess that she was naturally extravagant and proud. Her father had possessed a mere competence, with which he managed to live comfortably, and give his children the advantages of education. Charlotte at the boarding school felt many a pang, as she compared her simple costume, with the costly dresses of her companions: and compared her home with theirs. Now, as her husband was richer than her father, she considered him immensely wealthy; and had resolved to be the finest lady in the city. Barton had indulged her until he found that she would never be satisfied, and he now resolved to appeal to her reason. He saw that she had read his lesson, and forbore remark.—The flush of excited feeling faded from her cheek, and she looked at him imploringly, as he drew up in front of a small house, in an unfashionable street. They were admitted by a lovely woman, in plain, neat, clothing: whom Charlotte immediately recognized a school companion; a meek, gentle girl, much in her own circumstances; and one who having never envied, she had almost forgotten. 'You are welcome, dear Charlotte,' she cried joyfully, 'I am glad that you are not one of those who go to the assessor's book to find the real value of their friends. Pray lay off your cloak; and let us have a little friendly chat, after our long separation.' Then as she served some excellent cake, fruit and wine she continued, 'I am so happy to see you the wife of Mr. Barton; I know you must be happy, for his character is well known, and you always had a passion for magnificence, which truly becomes you. I never was ambitious of aught in a husband but integrity and love; and these it has pleased Heaven to allot me. And I am happy. I have no wish beyond what I now enjoy. I want for nothing; my home is like a bower of roses, where the dove builds her nest; and the sun and the dew, mingle forever. The world passes on with its pomp, and pride, and ambition, but I heed it not; for these things are not happiness. I love and am beloved; and He, from whom comes every good and perfect gift, smiles on this union of affection, and adds his blessings, health and contentment. We earn our daily bread, and it is sweet and invigorating. I would not exchange my present situation for that of the Queen of England.'

'We have spent a very pleasant hour,' said Mr. Barton, as they rose to depart.—'We shall insist upon your visiting us, Mrs. Green. Come Charlotte, we have one more call to make and we must be at home before our guests arrive.'

'And I suppose we shall attend the ball this evening, we can call at the milliners, and get my ball dress.'

'Have you money with you, Charlotte?'

'I have one hundred dollars, which will nearly reach the expenses; and I suppose that you have your purse with you.'

'I have; but here is the residence of the family on whom our calls are to be made.'

'What, here! Does any body live here, in this old dilapidated ruin?'

'Come in and we shall see.'

They entered a miserable room; through the chinks and shackling casements of which, the keen winds were whispering, keeping the atmosphere far below the freezing point in defiance of the scanty fire that flickered in the chimney. Charlotte shuddered; but she soon forgot the dwelling, in the contemplation of its occupants. A shadow of a woman, with a babe at her breast, sat beside a low bed, with her elbow on the pillow and her head upon her hand; her auburn hair hung in disheveled luxuriance around her pale face; and from the long fringes of her drooping eye-lids the big tears were slowly falling. But there was neither sob nor sigh, so deep, so weary was her sorrow. A young man lay on the bed whose clust'ring black curls, glowing cheeks and brilliant eyes, contrasted strangely with the livid lip and brow, and hand so like a withered lily. His quick ear detected the presence of his visitors, he turned his head and sprang up with a glad cry—

'Oh Barton! Have you come to soften my death bed? I thought I was forgotten by the world. Very different have been our destinies since we played together under the old elms that shaded the school house. Since the disastrous fire which consumed my fathers property and my own, and left me with my young bride, scarce a month married, without a house or a solitary dollar; I have seen dark and sorrowful days. The general calamity seemed to have swallowed up individual sympathy; and there were so many in want, that none found relief. I however obtained a situation as an under clerk, in which capacity I served until disease laid me upon this bed, from which I shall arise no more. But how did you discover me?'

'Your physician appealed to me last evening in your behalf, and when he mentioned your name, I resolved to see you as soon as possible. It was the first intelligence I had received of you since your marriage.—In truth, Beaumont, my mind was so occupied, that I hardly thought of you, or any of my early friends unless I saw them, or heard their names mentioned. But we must not lose time in idle chat; the doctor thinks there is yet hope of your recovery.'

'Oh repeat those blessed words again,' cried Mrs. Beaumont, eagerly grasping Barton's arm; 'say once more there is hope, for those words fall upon my burning spirit, like refreshing rain upon the scorched and flagging flowret. Oh say it once more, there is hope!'

'Mary! be calm, love,' said the sick man, and his eyes filled with tears; 'this hope like most of those that have arisen on your pathway, will soon be lost in the blackness of despair. I feel that I must die. Do not weep so, Mary; we must all die, and blessed are the dead that die in the Lord. You will protect my wife, Barton, and return her to her widowed mother, and the widow's God will comfort and support her, and my fatherless boy.' 'Barton,' said he in a suppressed voice, 'we are suffering for lack of food and fire.'

'You shall be speedily provided with all things necessary, and a servant also,' said Barton.

'And if your lonely wife becomes a widow,' said Charlotte tremulously, 'she shall be well taken care of. She shall live with us and be my sister, if she will; or I will accompany her to her mother's dwelling.'

'Bless you, bless you both,' murmured Beaumont, and poor Mary clasped her hands convulsively as they departed to procure and dispatch to them the promised aid.

As they proceeded homeward, they were suddenly accosted by a young man of their acquaintance, with 'Mr. Barton please step into that house.'

He immediately sprang from the sleigh, handed out his wife, and opened the door designated. Within all was confusion and distress. In the centre of the room stood an iron faced man, an officer of the law, speaking in threatening tones to a pale, drooping fellow man, around whose knees four little boys were clinging, while a beautiful little girl, of probably ten years, stood on a stool beside him, with her arms about her neck, while the big tears streamed down her rosy cheeks, and hung glittering in the dark locks upon his temple. At the far side of the room, with her face to the wall sat a female, sobbing convulsively over an infant which was crying piteously. There was scarcely any furniture or fire in the house. 'There, is no use in all this,' continued the officer, 'come along, I say.'

'What has the poor man done?' tremulously enquired Charlotte.

'I presume he cannot pay his debts,' replied Barton.

'And are they going to take him to prison?' she enquired with a shudder.

The weeping woman turned around. 'It is even so,' she said. 'He cannot pay his debts. Last summer he lay sick with a fever; after he began to recover, those who had ostentatiously trusted us during his sickness, sued for our dues, and took away our furniture, and even the tools from his workshop; thus as it were, cutting off his hands. Since then he could scarce earn his board, and all my exertions would barely clothe the children, which has always been my task; and now the doctor has sued him, and he must go to jail, and we must starve.'

'For what amount is the arrest?' asked Barton of the officer.

'Thirty dollars, sir, and cost.'

'Well, release the man, and call at my office,—I will pay the debt.'

'You are a stranger to me sir, and I have lost so much by showing mercy to these poor fellows, that I have grown cautious.'

'My name is Charles Barton, will you take my security?'

'Oh certainly, sir.'

'You are at liberty, Gilbert.'

The wife sprang to her husband's arms, and Barton and Charlotte hurried from their eager expressions of gratitude.

'Will you call at the milliners,' asked Charles, as they re-entered the sleigh.

'Oh no! I will not spend money for such things any more. Never, never! I gave my purse to that dear little girl, that clung to my pelesse. I will have no plate either, I will save all I can for the sick and suffering. I never knew till now what money was made for. I did not think there was such misery in the world, among deserving people. I thought that none but the lazy and abandoned were utterly destitute. But I shall never be happy again; in the midst of plenty I shall think of those who are perishing unpitied and unknown.'

'My dear Charlotte, if I had thought that we live only for ourselves, I would not thus have pained you. I have heard many assert that it is wrong to damp the joyful young spirit, with the knowledge of human woe and destitution. But since these things are, and must be, surely they should know it who have means to give relief. I believe with the wise man, that it is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting; and, also, that by sadness of the countenance, the heart is made better. I am happy to find the well of goodness in your young heart so ready to overflow. I had rather my wife should win the blessings of those who were ready to perish, than the admiration of the whole fashionable world. And in the hour of death Charlotte, for we must all lay low, will not the money we have expended in love to our fellow creatures, appear richer than hoarded millions, which we could enjoy no longer? Since you have given up the ball, we will make our arrangements, and go this evening to carry consolation to the Beaumonts.'

'With all my heart, dear Charles. It will be a mournful pleasure, but one which will never fail to give satisfaction in the review. I shall no longer be a mere cypher in society; and my only emulation shall be the desire of rivalling you in acts of kindness and benevolence.'

'Bless you, love. You have made me happy,' cried Barton, tenderly; 'and I trust that not only you and I, but many a reclaimed wanderer, and relieved sufferer, will find abundant reason to remember this as a Happy New Year.'

RESOLUTION.—The longer we live the more we are impressed with the deep importance of cultivating this excellent quality. It is greatly overlooked in the estimates of a man's character. We speak of his generosity; his courage, his integrity, his manners, and attainments! we call him amiable, affectionate, intelligent, but inquire if he is resolute. We praise the resolution by which an individual carries on a great design, but that is not what we mean. The less obtrusive but far more valuable peculiarity to which we allude, is that quiet never sleeping spirit which pervades some men's existence, and is in fact, the secret cause of their greatness and wealth, and success in whatever they undertake. It is the spell by which so insignificant a creature as an ant piles a hill for his dwelling; by which the coral insect raises an island in the ocean. It is more valuable than gold, and will accomplish more than genius, with half the disappointment and peril.

JOHN HUNTER.—This ingenious man had so much diligence that he often told his friends that for forty years, summer and winter, the sun never found him in bed. "I never have any difficulties," said he, "a thing either can be or it cannot. If it can be done, I may as well do it as another, if I take equal pains. If it cannot be done, I will not attempt to do it." Mr. Hunter made the completest collection in comparative anatomy that ever was assembled together.

The beauty of the rainbow vanishes in the storm; the meteor's flash is but a moment; the glittering gems of heaven will one day go out; the sun himself will be extinguished; but the star of hope shines beautifully for ever.

DEFERRED SUMMARY.

MASSACHUSETTS STATE PRISON.

The whole number confined at any period during the past yast year, (i. e. from 1st. Oct. 1838 to 30th Sept. 1839) is 407. 104 have been received on sentence in the course of the year; 77 have been discharged on the expiration of their sentence; 7 have been pardoned, or their sentence remitted, and 5 have died, leaving 318 in the prison at this time. Of the 104 received, 29 are natives of Massachusetts: 54 are natives of other states, and 21 are foreigners. 83 of them can read quite well; 73 can both read and write; 64 can read, write and cypher; 10 can read but poorly, and 10 cannot read at all. Of the whole number, 53 were habitually intemperate: 44 were habitual or occasional drinkers, though not to intoxication (moderate drinkers is the proper designation for them;) 6 were strictly temperate. 15 have been gamblers: 47 have companied with lewd women: 74 have lived in habitual violation of the Sabbath; 44 left home in early life as apprentices; 24 were apprentices who did not serve out their time; 46 have been married; 25 have children living; 12 had lost parents, 12 had lost a mother, and 25 had lost a father, before they were 21 years of age; 13 are colored persons, constituting one eighth of the whole number received, whereas the proportion of the colored population in the State is but one eightieth—showing the neglect of education and pious instruction among that class of our population.

These are facts that deserve to be well considered, particularly in the bearing of the question, What ought to be the education of the young—literary altogether, or moral and religious? Sabbath-breakers, drunkards, and moderate drinkers, and drunkard makers, and lewd men, may find much salutary admonition in these records of the State Prison—for they are only a specimen of the records of all such prisons, so far as those records are kept and published.

The prison is well regulated. The officers are all able and upright men—amiable, firm, and devoted to the moral welfare of those committed to their charge. No commotion nor tumults, nor occasion for extraordinary punishments have occurred in the course of the year.

The financial concerns of the institution have resulted favorably. After meeting all expenses, the excess of income over the expenditure, amounts to $4,633 27. Not that all this is immediately available. It is chiefly vested in stock on hand, which cannot be disposed of, until the state of building operations in the community shall create a demand for it. A State Prison is a necessary evil: but through the persevering efforts of the Secretary of the Prison Discipline Society, and the hearty co-operation of our rulers, and the officers of the institution, our own causes the wrath of man, to praise God, and restrains the remainder of wrath.—Boston Recorder.

Texan Statistics.—The whole story told.—The following minute statistics of Austin are said to be correct:—On the first of January, 1839, the whole population, members of congress, speculators, gamblers, loafers, and all, amounted to 856—whites 711.—White adult males 550, white adult females 61! children 100, families 75, mechanics 35, lawyers 4, physicians 5, printing-offices 2, taverns 6, stores 9, groceries 9, billiard-room 1, and faro banks 6.—Houston Star.

Pardon.—Thos. Clark, the colored man, who was sentenced by the Circuit Court of the United States to be hung on the first of May next, for the murder of an American seaman on the African coast, has been pardoned by the President of the United States, and was yesterday discharged from the states prison by Burrington Authony, Esq., marshal of this district.—Providence Courier.

Singular Occurrence.—A family of eight persons, in Germantown, Pennsylvania, was strangely affected last Sunday morning, on attempting to rise from their beds. The mother rose first and, on stepping out, fell prostrate on the floor; the father, on hastening to his wife's assistance, met with a similar fate. The children being awakened by the noise, and called upon for aid, sprang out of their beds, but, on reaching the floor every one of them sank helplessly down. A fit of severe vomiting ensued, accompanied with violent pain in the head, each one being affected precisely alike. Under these distressing circumstances help arrived, and medical aid being summoned, the cause was immediately detected in a disjointed pipe of a coal stove in the lower story; the doors above having been left ajar, the gas filled the chambers, and hence the consequences. A few hours longer exposure to this deleterious atmosphere might have proved fatal; as it was fresh air and a little nursing, we are pleased to say, have restored all to usual health.—Germantown Tel.

Great Defection from the Church of Rome.—The whole Roman Catholic population in Lithuania and White Russia with their bishops and priests, have seceded from the Romish church & connected themselves with the Russia Greek church. We state this fact on the authority of the pope, who bitterly deplores its occurrence in an allocution dated November 22, 1839.—Achill. Her.

Education Convention.—The National Convention to consider the subject of education in the United States, is to meet at Washington on the 6th May next. Those interested in the important subjects there to be discussed should not forget to appoint delegates in time. Colleges, Lyceums, public bodies connected with institutions for education, and meetings called for the purpose by the friends of education, are entitled to be represented in the Convention.—Balt. American.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

DEVOTED TO RELIGION, LITERATURE, AND GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

EDITED BY AN ASSOCIATION OF MINISTERS.

PUBLISHED BY GREENE, CAMPBELL, AND BURDICK.

VOLUME I. DE RUYTER, MADISON COUNTY, N. Y., THIRD-DAY, MAY 19, 1840. NUMBER 11.

NOTE.—We are reminded of an error which escaped the notice of the proof reader in the former No. on Christian Union.—It occurs near the close of the article in the omission of the word "free." The sentence should read thus: They might command the whole time and talents of an able minister free from the unhallowed influence exerted by sectarian prejudice.—EDS.

RELIGIOUS.

BE IN EARNEST.

Earnestness indicates a state of mind and feeling which is sufficiently understood without a definition. It implies a conciousness of the importance of some particular object, and a strong determination to pursue it, disregarding or overpowering all those obstacles which are formidable to weak and irresolute minds. This intensity of feeling, when properly controlled by the judgment, very materially assists the success of any project. It is the ardor of the successful student, the ambition of the successful soldier or statesman, the enterprise of the successful merchant, and the enthusiasm of the successful painter and sculptor. In religion it finds its true province and noble reward. If our interest should be awakened in proportion to the magnitude of the subject which excites it, nothing deserves a deeper and more absorbed interest, than the religion of the gospel, which presents itself to our mind, accompanied by its divine credentials, as the way to eternal life. It is not a collection of oriental legends to amuse or a cunningly devised fable to deceive, but a veritable revelation from God, disclosing life and immortality. It professes to teach that truth of all others, to us the most important, how a polluted and ruined sinner, may secure a title to the endless joys of the heavenly world. This surely is an object, with which the pursuits of time and sense can bear no comparison. There must be an infinite disparity of interest between that which concerns our well-being for a few years, and that which will give direction to our future, unalterable, and eternal destiny. Reason admits this, and yet the practice of the majority of men denies it. A little observation of the world will convince us that while men display no deficiency in earnestness of feeling, it is sadly misdirected, by being spent on objects, if not absolutely worthless, at least of temporary interest. The bustle, the eagerness, the enterprise, and the ambition of the mass of mankind revolve in a very limited circle, and are expended on objects which perish in the using. Beyond the horizon of the world they never extend their thoughts; eternity and its realities are unthought of and unheeded. Groveling pursuits, unworthy occupation for an immortal mind!

It was not certainly for this we were created. Every thing which characterizes man, as superior to all the other works of this lower creation, indicates for him a loftier destiny. He is to outlive the visible creation around him; the spirit which dwells within assures him of this; and the divine revelation assures him that this eternal existence, is to be in blessedness or woe.—This truth, however, momentous as it is, has but very little general influence. Thousands hear it with apathy, for one who listens with interested attention; and while the former labor for the things which perish, few comparatively strive to enter in at the strait gate. If there be any truth in religion, it is unquestionably one of its revelations, that no man can enter into the kingdom of heaven, who does not keep his eye steadfastly fixed on it, who has not his heart warmed by the prospect of it, and who does not make it the principle object of his life to reach it. Whatever may be the false and delusive opinions of the world on the subject, the Bible, which is the only infallible guide in this matter, represents the necessity of much vigilance and exertion, much self-denial and prayer, many struggles and contests, before we can finish our course with joy, and lay hold on the crown of life. Those who are sensible of no higher objects than the accumulation of worldly wealth, or the attainment of carnal gratifications, and who spend their days and their years in their pursuit, will find themselves miserably mistaken, if they expect it at last. What a man labors for, that alone can he hope to obtain. It would be folly in a merchant to expect his ships to return to him freighted with the riches of Indies, if he should keep them lying in inactivity at his wharves; and not a particle less foolish is the expectation of heavenly riches if we use no adequate exertion for their attainment. Piety towards God, is and must be the first and principal thing with one who will take his place at the right hand of God; and he that disregards it altogether, or even attempts to make it a subordinate thing in his attention, will in despite of all the self-flatteries he may use, find himself inevitably thrust out from the kingdom of heaven. Not only will those who are avowedly of the world fall far short of final salvation, but multitudes whose religion consists merely in profession. The line which now divides the visible Church from the world is not that which will finally separate the saved from the lost. The Church below is not a perfect type of that above; many who obtain a place in the former, will never secure an entrance into the latter. Fallible men may easily be deceived in judging of the characters of those they admit into the one, but an omniscient God is to judge of the qualifications which will entitle to a place in the other. Many eat and drink in the presence of Christ, and some alas! even prophesy in his name, who shall not be recognized in the last day in any other character than that of workers of iniquity. Many name Christ who do nothing more; they are as much absorbed in the world as ever; they take as little interest in the concerns of Christ's kingdom as before their nominal profession; they show not by their devotional feelings and the fruits of piety, that they have set it on the heavenly pilgrimage—in a word, they are not in earnest in religion, and how can they promise themselves its glorious rewards. All who wish to avoid the shipwreck of the soul, should regard religion, true personal religion, as that to which, above all other things, the direction is applicable, "what thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."—Presbyterian.

THE LOVE OF GOD.

A Sabbath Morning Meditation.

"Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us.—1 John iii. 16.

1. Behold, Lord, thus encouraged, thus invited, I come; yet I do not presume to do so, trusting in my own righteousness, but in thy manifold and great mercies. I feel, alas! my weaknesses and wants, and betake myself to thee for relief; sick and diseased, I fly to the physician of souls; hungry and thirsty, to this fountain of living water, and bread of life; poor and needy, to the bountiful king of heaven; a servant to his kind master! a creature to his compassionate creator, who hateth nothing that he hath made; and a forlorn disconsolate wretch to thee, the holy, the eternal, the only comforter, but,

2. Whence is this to me, that my God should vouchsafe to come unto me; or, who am I that thou shouldst communicate to me thy own self? how shall a wicked sinner dare to appear before thee! or how canst thou who art of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, endure to make such condescending approaches to a soul polluted with sin and with uncleanness? thou seest my very inward parts, and knowest I have nothing in me that is good; nothing to invite such mercy; nothing fit for the reception of so pure, so glorious a majesty.

3. I will therefore most humbly confess my own vileness and thy unspeakable goodness; I will most thankfully admire, and praise, and adore thy marvelous love, and exceeding abundant grace. For this is purely thine own act. Nothing on my part could deserve, nothing could move thee to it. The more unworthy I am, the more conspicuous is thy goodness, the more amazing thy mercy and condescension.

4. Since therefore thou art pleased to stoop so low, be it unto me according to thy word. Since thou hast thought fit to command my approach, I will most gladly testify my ready obedience; and only beg that my own sinfulness may not render me odious in thy sight, nor frustrate these inestimable mercies to me. I will supply my want of ability by the earnestness of my zeal; and most humbly beseech thee to accept those hearty desires of the inestimable benefit, by which my soul and all its faculties thirst and pant most impatiently after thee and thy righteousness. I will turn my eyes into my own heart, and entertain myself with the mortifying prospect of my own unworthiness, laying my soul low before thee; and from the sense of my sin I will flee to thy mercy, that I may be made whole by the body and blood of my Redeemer.

5. How wise, how saving, was thy design, in the first institution of this holy supper! how rich, how delightful a banquet hast thou prepared for thy guests, by ordering thy own body and blood for the mystical entertainment of the faithful! how astonishing are the operations of thy grace and power! how incomprehensible the methods of fulfilling thy most true promise! Thou speakest the word in the beginning, and all things were created! and by the same almighty word, thou commandest bread and wine, and they nourish souls to eternal life.

6. And thou, my soul, rejoice and be exceedingly glad for so noble a favor, so heavenly a refreshment, so rich a consolation to support and sweeten thy passage through this vale of tears and misery. For, every time thou attendest these holy mysteries, thou dost spiritually eat the flesh of Christ, and drink his blood; thou dost act as if it were, over again the work of thy redemption, and effectually partake of thy Savior's merits and sufferings. For his love continues always the same, and the excellence and worth of his propitiation is an inexhaustible spring of mercy. Come therefore hither with new exalted zeal, enlarge thy heart and its desires, and doubt not but thou shalt at every approach, return with fresh and plentiful accessions of grace.

7. Let not the frequency abate thy devotion; for this favor should always seem great, this feast always honorable, and the delights of it always new. And by the force of pious meditation, the mystery will affect thy wondering mind at every repetition, as if the son of God were just that moment born from the womb of his mother; as if thy suffering Redeemer were in that instant laboring under all his agonies; and thine own eyes beheld him hanging and bleeding, and dying on the cross.

THE POET'S BOOKS.

BY LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY.

A Poet should be conversant with God
In all His works. For, from the untrodden cliff
Where fiery Andes mocks the driven cloud—
To the obscurest mass, which artic storms
Deny an efflorescence—from the roar
Of the wild rainbow-cinctur'd cataract,
To the slight ripple of the loneliest lake,
All speak of Him.

Choose not the ponderous tomes,
Where Science wastes away the oil of life,
And early hoary, seeks the voiceless tomb,
Its lesson still unlearn'd; nor lose thyself
In the entangling lore of many lands,
Until thy mother tongue seem strange to thee.
Much knowledge is much toil, and hath no end.
But come thou forth, amid the breeze-swept trees,
And learn their language. Ask the peaceful vales,
Where roam the herds, or where the reaper plies
His busy sickle—ask the solemn sea,
With all its foaming wilderness of waves
To spread their many volumes out for thee,
And search thou there, on every changeful leaf,
Jehovah's name.

Question the rough-leafed herb,
That lines the simpler's scrip, nor scorn to heed
Such answer as its healing essence yields.
Talk with the fire-fly, as it gilds the eve—
And catch the murmur of the waving boughs,
Where hides the slumbering nest.

List when the Night,
That dark-robed queen, disbands the muffled stars,
And to the young ear of the trembling dawn
Uttereth the Maker's name. And when the Day
Casts all its deeds into grey Twilight's lap,
And weary, sinking in oblivion's sleep,
Doth wail the judgment—be thou there, to take
The burden of true wisdom on thy harp,
And teach another age.

So shalt thou be
Remember'd from thine ashes—if thy book
Was glorious Nature, and thy teacher—God!
And thy heart's creed, such Poesy, as makes Virtue more lovely—such a hymn as they
Who lead the eternal choir of seraphim,
Might set to music.

Hartford, Conn.

VENNING'S CHRISTIAN SENTENCES.

There is little difference between not doing what thou shouldst, and not doing it as thou shouldst; for to do thy duty only in show, or only for a show, is to do thy duty and be still dutiful.

The natural death is the separation of the soul from the body; the spiritual death is the separation of the soul from God; and the eternal death is an eternal separation of the soul and body from God.

If God be better to others than he is to thee, yet while he is better to thee than thou deservest, thou hast no cause to complain.

Many men while they spend their time in disputing what they should do, do too often neglect the things which are without dispute.

Inward goodness without an outward show of it, is like a tree without fruit, useless; and an outward show of goodness without inward sincerity, is like a tree without heart, lifeless.

Though that which thou seekest for be good; yet while the way by which thou seekest for it is evil, thou shamest the end by the way, and wilt shame thyself in the end.

In religion not to do as thou sayest, is to unsay thy religion in thy deeds, and to undo thyself by doing.

Many men do nothing else than make work for repentance, and yet do any else than repent of their work.

A man should do nothing which should not be imitated: and a man should imitate nothing which should not be done.

Be careful to do nothing that deserves to be ill spoken of, and then thou needest not care if thou be undeservedly spoken of.

A saint may well ask, What shall I render to the Lord for all his benefits? when he hath not what to render for any of his benefits, being less than the least of all his mercies.

The devil sometimes tempts believers to sin, and that causeth them to doubt; and sometimes he tempts them to doubt, and that causeth them to sin.

God doth not at any time put off his people, because he is not in a capacity to give mercy: but doth many times put them off, because they are not in a capacity to receive mercy.

The gospel breaks hard hearts, and heals broken hearts.

Hypocrites are apt to think that they have grace, because they have gifts.—Matt. ii. 22.

Saints are many times thinking that they have no grace, because they have no gifts.—1 Cor. xii. 15, 16.

We should be willing to do like those, on earth, in duty, whom we would be like, in heaven, in glory.

If Abraham's bosom be desirable, why should not Abraham's faith and obedience? seeing, unless we be faithful (though not so full of faith) as Abraham, we are not likely to be glorified as Abraham.

MR HERVEY'S RULES.

Be always cheerful as well as serious, that you may win men to religion.

Avoid all controversies.

Talk familiarly to children about religion, as a delightful employment. Put easy questions to them, and encourage them by little presents.

Pray for all who affront or injure you.

Accustom yourself to a regular and daily course of devout retirement.

Accustom yourself to secret ejaculations in walking, riding, or in whatever company you happen to be.

Use frequent meditation; nothing can be more profitable than this.

Entertain the highest regard for the word of God, and disperse religious books, if your circumstances will permit.

Encourage by your influence and your purse too if you can afford it, societies for promoting the Gospel both at home and abroad.

When you reprove, let it be tenderly, privately, and with all due humility.

For the reformation of swearing, lying, slandering and Sabbath-breaking, passionate or unchaste persons, you must write hints on slips of paper (or procure printed tracts) against any of these vices, and give them to, or place them in the way of, such persons.

Make it a rule to have one religious sentence at least, in all the letters you write to your relations or friends.

Write down the reasons which at any time make you afraid to die; and then endeavor by faith, prayer, and conversation with experienced Christians, to remove the causes.

FOR THE MINISTER.

CANDIDATES FOR THE MINISTRY.

Many seem to entertain the opinion, that if you can make a minister of any man, he will of course be much more useful, than in a private station. No opinion can be more erroneous; even in the new countries, a pious layman of plain understanding, is far more useful than the same man, clothed with the sacred office. Neither is it commonly advisable for men who have been long in another profession, to become ministers, they are sure to bring with them the technical habits of their former pursuits. It is a good general rule, and scriptural, for every man to abide in the calling in which he was called. And there is no lawful profession in which a person of eminent piety may not be very useful; and surely, piety and talent are needed in other callings beside the ministry. Some may think, that instead of wishing to increase ministers, the tendency of my remark is, to discourage men from entering the sacred office. I confess, that I am more solicitous to have those that aspire to the ministry, suitably qualified, than to have it filled ever so full with unqualified men. The necessity of eminent piety in ministers, need not be proved by labored argumentation. Nobody denies it. The wicked world expect it; and as far as external conduct is concerned, exact it. Let the guide of souls be what he professes, to be a man of God, thoroughly furnished to every good work. Let the youth who aspires to this office imbibe the pure and humble spirit of the Gospel. Let him make thorough trial of his prudence, sobriety, and stability, before he offers himself. Let his friends also be free and faithful with their friendly counsels to inexperienced youth. Rather let them, at first, lean to the side of discouragement than the contrary. Many more are pushed forward, who should remain in the back ground, than are retarded or hindered, when they should go forward. Let it be remembered that the most deserving will commonly be the most reserved and diffident. We should be cautious of encouraging a forward, self-confident youth to think of the ministry. At any rate he should be repressed for the present. He may learn, by sore experience, his own weakness and want of wisdom. Bring forward the timid, reserved, and diffident youth, who need to be taken by the hand and encouraged. But before any one is recommended to be supported by the funds of the church, let a fair trial be made of his capacity, at home. Let his first probation be in his father's cottage, or in his master's shop. There is too much encouragement given to young men to lean on the arm of charity. It would be far better to cast them for a while on their own resources.—Dr. Alexander.

From the Lutheran Herald.

"AND YET THERE IS ROOM."

What a delightful assurance contained in the inspired declaration, "And yet there is room," to the humble christian and the inquiring penitent! The whole parable is designed to teach and to illustrate the fullness and freeness of the gospel provisions of salvation. A provision of gospel mercy has been made suitable to fallen man, abundant, rich and all-glorious. How often it is the case that persons may be excluded from a feast given by man in consequence of inferiority, contracted selfish partiality and because there may not be any room; but this is never the case with those who sincerely desire to partake of gospel salvation in compliance with the undeviating conditions of repentance and faith. All who will, may partake of the sacred festival of the gospel and partake of its lasting benefits. How many have already been brought to the enjoyment of its blessings in the reformation of life, holiness of heart and rejoicing in a heart big with immortal glory. From every clime, country, kingdom, nation and kindred, souls have found a release from sin and the power of darkness, and have been brought to the enjoyment of God on high, "and yet there is room." What soul inspiring words are these to the doubting and desponding! To the christian they are like ointment poured forth, and to the sinner they convey a rebuke for his soul-murdering procastination of repentance, and encouragement to every attempt for reconciliation with the Father of mercies.

There is room in the affections of Christ. Hark! how loud and mellifluous the strain that bursts from angelic lips, undulating from the mid-way heavens and echoed by Judea's mountains in melody sweet, "Glory to God in the highest; peace on earth and good will to men." Good will to men, is breathed forth in every act, desire, miracle, rebuke, exhortation, lesson of virtue, sorrow and suffering of the Son of God from the cradle unto the grave. His whole life on earth speaks a volume of his all embracing affections. He stands forth conspicuous to the whole world with the blessed welcome on his lips, "Come, for all things are now ready"—"If any man thirst, let him take the waters of life freely." The Savior's affections for the world, while it lay in utter rebellion and ruin, constrained him to exchange a court of glory, diadems of honor and a robe of effulgent light too dazzling for Angels' gaze, for a land of darkness, dishonor and reproach, poverty, malevolence and persecution unto death.—While the sorrowful Redeemer lay on the cold ground of Gethsemane, while the dews of night gently distilled to moisten the grass, and sighed forth to the fanning zephyrs notes of unforgotten love, the adjoining hills groaned the interrogation, "Was there ever such love as this?" When with meekness, patience and pitying love, the Savior endured the spittings, reproach, mockery, false accusation, and craven, wilful condemnation in Pilate's Hall, the judgment-seat, the ceiling and every human heart suppressed with malice, instinctively cried out, "Such love ere now was never witnessed, no, never." When nailed to the accursed tree and groaning agony pierced his frame, the gazing spectator, the mourning disciples, the adamantine heart of the soldiery, the infernal regions of wo, the darkening skies, the appalling clouds, the breaking rocks, the rumbling earthquake, the trembling ground, the gory cross, the gushing blood, the dying frame, the eye in rolling agony, the quivering lips, the departing Ghost, all—all loudly cried "This is the love of a God," and upwards the echo flew till caught by angels' harps, and then in louder strains it rolled the heavenly arches round in notes countless as the beams of endless day. Thus can you any longer doubt, whether there is room in the affections of a Savior. Go and confide unreservedly in him for salvation, and you are secure in time and eternity.

There is room in the love of God. GOD IS LOVE. In him is love unfathomable, boundless and ever-enduring, without change or interruption. All his providential dealings are lined with mysterious love. The works of nature bespeak their Author's benevolence and goodness—the vegetable kingdom arrayed in verdant beauty and gorgeous apparrel; the stupenduous earth, with its mountain-heights, and waving forests—the azure heavens, studded with stars and glorious orbs of light—the rolling sun—the pealing thunders—the congenial spring—the munificent autumn, with honor and benevolence crowned—nature above, beneath and all around, proclaims with ten thousand tongues the love of Israel's God, in unison with the wisely wrought fame of man, and his powers of mind. Notwithstanding all nature sends forth such a clear tone of God's unbounded goodness and love; still the glorious theme of salvation from beginning to end, from the base to the top-stone, speaks forth a sweeter, more enchanting strain of matchless love. The plan of salvation devised by the Father, expressed and rendered complete by the gift and interposition of the Son, and graciously and gloriously applied by the agency of the Holy Spirit, announces in melody of joy and holy enthusiasm the illimitable and all-absorbing love of God.

The invitations of mercy unfold the love of God—"Come unto me all ye ends of the earth, and be ye saved, for I am God, and there is none else," expresses the far-reaching and all-embracing love of God—"Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters;" "and whosoever will, let him come and take of the waters of life freely," developed the freedom and fullness of divine mercy. "God has no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked may turn and live," declares his peculiar solicitude for the salvation of the lost and wretched. The pen of Infinite Wisdom has inscribed the image of love, on the ample page of nature all around and in mystic pencilings o'er the azure skies; exquisitely impressed on the page of Divine Grace, the suffering and death of Christ, the intercession of the Mediator and deliverance of blood-bought souls from sin and folly and their reception into the kingdom of unfading blessedness. Love—O how sweet and drawing thy virtues!

There is room in the Church of God. The church of God must yet expand, or push its victories forward to the ends of the earth, when Ethiopia shall stretch her hands with joy to God and the Isles of the ocean shall resound with his praises. The people of God give a cordial welcome to the sinner repenting of his sins to taste and see that the Lord is good. Enter in! Enter in, all ye repenting prodigals and there is plenteous room among the people of God. While many are passing through the church militant on earth into the regions of triumph, there is room for you also.

Finally, there is room in the kingdom of Heaven. Many portions of the Holy Scriptures portray the blessedness awaiting the pious beyond the stormy flood of time. The two last chapters of Revelation give a description of the New Jerusalem. "And I, John saw the Holy city New Jerusalem, coming down from God, out of Heaven prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of Heaven, saying, behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them and be their God; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away." What exquisite delights shall be enjoyed in the courts of amazing glory. No pain, sickness, weeping nor death. A freedom from all the ills man is heir to in this world. There are crowns of glory, shouts of praise, palms of victory, harps of gold and "all glory" rolling its ceaseless round on the high and holy air of Paradise add along the shores and hills of God. Awakened, repenting sinner there is room in heaven for you; then speedily prepare with grace thy soul to meet the Judge. Say to thy soul—

> "From this world's joy and senseless mirth,
> O come, my soul! in haste retire;
> Assume the grandeur of thy birth,
> And to thy native heaven aspire."

THE CRUCIBLE.

"I have just received two specimens of ore, supposed to contain gold," said the pastor to young Ernest. "I wish you to come and see them." "With pleasure," replied the young man. "Now, said the pastor, which do you suppose contains the greatest quantity of gold?" "Most undoubtedly," replied Ernest, "this beautiful shining specimen. I do not think that rough, homely piece contains more than a few grains."—"Let us go," answered the pastor, "to the goldsmith." The goldsmith put the shining piece which had so much pleased Ernest, into the crucible, but it was speedily consumed, and not a single grain of pure metal remained. Ernest was astonished. "You need not, I am sure," said he, "try the other, if such has been the fate of my favorite." "Let us see," answered the goldsmith. The rough piece was now put into the crucible. Ernest beheld the ore cracking, and consuming in the intense heat, but to his surprise a small stream of beautiful, shining, pure gold was plainly visible when the dross was destroyed.—"I have," said the pastor, "been similarly disappointed. I have admitted many talented, promising young men into the church, who afterwards gave me nothing but grief, they did not endure the trial.—While others, who on account of their modesty, and natural timidity, scarcely passed the session, endured every trial, and showed by their works, that they were genuine Christians."

Ernest.—"Was it so in the time of the apostles?"

Pastor.—"Yes, Simon Magus, Demas, and Alexander, the coppersmith, were all admitted by the apostles. Yet they caused nothing but grief to the church. While Saul, who could hardly obtain the fellowship of his brethren, so much did they fear him, was soon "not a whit behind the very chiefest of them."—Presbyterian Advocate.

KNOWLEDGE GOD'S GIFT.—there is no man living that can see all things, neither hath God given any man to know every thing. One seeth more clearly than another, one can utter a thing better than another; but no man ought to envy or despise another. He that can do better than another, should not set him at nought that understandeth less; yea, he that hath the more understanding ought to remember, that the same gift is not his, but God's, and that God hath given it to him, to teach and inform the ignorant.—Bishop Miles Coverdale.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, May 19, 1840.

Mr. GEORGE P. MAXSON is a traveling agent for this paper.

"THE WORD OF GOD IS NOT BOUND."

The word of Jehovah is not only all-creating but all-sustaining. When the Divine mandate went forth for worlds and systems to be, the creatures he willed to exist immediately sprang into being—light from darkness primeval—order from confusion, and existence, both physical and intellectual, from non-entity. In the work of Creation no obstacles presented themselves to the pleasure of God; and since creatures have risen in opposition to his government and laws, the dire effects of rebellion are made to rest on the transgressor, while the permanency of the principles of his kingdom is a theme of just exultation to all virtuous beings.

In this world the methods by which the infinite superiority of the word of the Most High are displayed and demonstrated, are no less mysterious than instructive. Human instrumentality has been employed in such a manner as not only to evince the native imbecility of the agent, but to show that truth is invincible. What rendered the miracles performed by the servants of God anciently so conspicuous, was the fact that they were known to be possessed of like passions and infirmities with their fellow-men, and therefore whatever of a miraculous nature was performed by them, proved them to be the subjects of the divine favor, and that the word of God was uncontroled. To the sovereignty of the word all nature bears testimony. At the bidding of the Incarnate Savior and his inspired servants the fury of the elements is calmed—the march of the glorious orb of day is arrested—diseases remove—wicked spirits fly—and even death resigns his victims. We have said above that the weakness and embarrassments of the instruments gave additional weight and effect to the successful dispensation of truth.—When the gospel was preached by Paul to kings and emperors, who might never have heard it but for his imprisonment, its power was felt and acknowledged by many who were too proud to embrace it; yet some of its most remarkable achievements were made while its propagator was loaded with chains and in anticipation of a martyr's crown. Among the fruits of his labors under these trying circumstances, were some of the brightest gems which ever adorned the militant body of Christ. Of such a system he might properly boast.—His sufferings, instead of divorcing his affections from Christ and the gospel, inflame his zeal and attachment for both; so that he was not ashamed of the one, and ardently desired to depart and be with the other. This eminent servant of Christ exhorts the church to pray that the word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified. And the glory of God, the health of his people, the rights of humanity, and the salvation of souls depend on the free circulation of this blessed word. Can any who drink into the spirit of this gospel entertain such a delicacy as will prevent them from exposing fearlessly the errors which abound in the professed church of God? And will they not speak out in obedience to their Master, though all the powers of earth and hell were arrayed against them? It was Paul's joy that though the minister might be bound, the word remained free, and gave proofs of its superiority and excellence in confounding its opposers—in sustaining its votaries, and multiplying its trophies under the greatest disadvantages. Who, then, should be ashamed of the gospel, or shrink from a defence of any portion of truth, however unpopular in the world! What a blessed freedom is that which the christian enjoys through faith in God's word! And what enlargement shall the church enjoy when she has courage to wage eternal war with every species of wickedness, and enlarge the place of her tent and the theatre of her action; when every fetter shall be broken, and when all the oppressed shall go free! Then shall "the least among them be as the house of David, and the house of David be as God." Till then whoever is straitened, is straitened in himself, and not in the word of God. That word will make free and shield all who love and trust in it.

ADVERTISEMENTS.—The patrons of the Register are, generally, too well acquainted with the circumstances which attended the commencement of its publication, to render any explanation of the course we find it expedient to pursue, in reference to advertising, necessary; but, for the information of those who do not so well understand the subject, we would say that it was never expected that a paper of the size of our present sheet could be supported with the patronage which could be obtained from subscribers alone. Even the Prospectus did not contemplate the publication of so large a sheet. But it was thought advisable to have the paper of the present size, and devote a portion of its columns to advertising. One important advantage which was anticipated in this course, was the facility it would afford for the publication of greater amount of reading matter when energy, in the hope of being able to make the paper acceptable and useful to the com munity at large. Will not our friends exer themselves to obtain as many subscriber as possible to commence with the secon quarter? A little effort on their part woul be very serviceable to the interests of th paper, and would be met with our warmes gratitude.

RETURN OF THE JEWS.—An impor appeal has lately been made to the Euro an Monarchs by the Jews, in which the turn of that nation to Palestine is stren ously argued, and the importance of takin preparatory measures for that purpos strongly urged. They plead the grant that land made by divine right to Abraham and his posterity, and express kind an generous feelings towards Christians.—In an extract, published by Maj. Noah fro a British Review, strong confidence is ex pressed that the return of that people Palestine is near at hand.

A Hamburg paper, the Dorpzeitung, ha the following—The Jews of Constantinopl have, with their Rabbi, declared that the will not wait any longer than another yea for their Messiah. If within that time, h does not appear, they will conclude he already come, and then they will conform the religion by which he is already recog nised. The Rabbi is entirely of this opin ion and has even proposed to his congrega tion to profess Christianity forthwith.

THE MAILS.—We are happy in the belie that our paper has thus far generally reache its destination without much delay. In few instances, however, there have bee complaints either that the paper did no come to subscribers at all, or that it came unseasonably. We have to say that the blame cannot rest on us, the paper havin been invariably mailed seasonably and wit the utmost care. That there should be occasional failures in the timely receipt of th paper, especially on cross routes, is no however strange to us, since our exchan ges and other communications are frequent ly a week behind the regular course of th mail, and are received from entirely op posite directions. We make these remark for the information of our subscriber without designing to censure others. W hope those inadvertencies complained will not be often repeated.

The New Yorker, Christian Intelligen cer, Baptist Advocate, Zion's Watchma Morning Star, Albany Journal, and oth papers, come to us very irregularly.

The report of the Education Societ forwarded to us some time since by brothe James R. Irish, has been delayed for the purpose of obtaining the other documents to which he refers us. As yet we have not seen them, though the person supposed to possess them has been applied to for them. A similar circumstance, also, has been our reason for not having published good. The preaching was principally done by brother S. Coon, who was assisted by br. S. Pitt, J. L. Scott and myself. The work seemed gradually to increase in interest and power during the ten days of the meeting.

INTELLIGENCE.

Correspondence of the Com. Advertiser.

BALTIMORE, May 8, 1840.

The present General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church is, on many accounts, one of the most important that have ever assembled since the organization of that Church in 1784. The numbers which it represents, the varied and superior talents which it combines, and the unusually important interests involved in its acts, invest it with an importance hitherto unknown and unfelt. The six Bishops are all present, and nearly all the representatives from the different annual conferences. The British Conference, as you know, is represented by the Rev. Robert Newton, and the Canada Conference by the Rev. Messrs. Stinson and Ryerson. Mr. Richey and Mr. Harvard, from the Canadas, are likewise present. Mr. Newton has preached frequently since he has been here, and has gained golden opinions from all who have heard him. On Sunday last he preached to six or eight thousand on Monument square. Next Sabbath he is to preach in the House of Representatives at Washton.

There has been no discussion as yet on the great points of interest which will engage the attention of the Conference. The time for that will be when reports from the various committees shall be presented. The subject of slavery and abolition, which has so deeply engrossed the feelings of the Church and of our entire country, will doubtless be a prominent one in the discussions of this body. Unhappily there are a few ultras, though their number is quite small, on each side of this question; and they may retard the final adjustment of it. But it will be disposed of, I doubt not in such a manner as both justice and mercy will sanction.

AWFUL CONFLAGRATION!!

PONTIAC IN ASHES!!!

Pontiac, Thursday, April 30, 2 P. M.

We hasten to announce the heart-rending intelligence that our late flourishing village is now one almost universal heap of ruins!

The fire broke out about noon in the Exchange, formerly occupied by E. Budington, corner of Saginaw and Lawrence st's. The wind was blowing fresh from the west. It was soon found impossible to save the building. An effort was then made to prevent the fire from reaching the opposite side of the street; this was soon found impossible, as the wind freshened. The first fire caught on the east side of Saginaw st.; we believe, in the building occupied by Messrs. Marsh and Hendrickson. It soon communicated to those on each side.

The flames, from both sides of Saginaw street now mingled into one, presenting a vast and uninterrupted sheet, from one side to the other, and reaching far over to the east, consuming every thing in its course.

On the west side every thing was swept clean, down to the building, corner of Saginaw and Pike streets; on the east every thing to Pike street—about twenty-five buildings in all, besides barns and other out houses!—and this in the very heart and business of the place. The property destroyed is immense.

STEAMBOAT DISASTERS.

Nine Lives Lost.—The Henderson (Ky.) Star states that on the 22d ult. the steamboat Green River, which plies on that stream, while descending the river, in attempting to pass lock and dam No. 1, the river being very high, and the current unusually strong, after crossing the lock, struck an eddy and capsized. Nine persons were drowned, five females, and four men. The names of those lost we have not learned. Four of the females were daughters of a widow lady, a passenger.

From the St. Louis Bulletin, of April 27.

Steamboat sunk and loss of Life.—The steamboat Bedford, Capt. Walker, in descending the Missouri river, near the mouth on Saturday evening, struck a snag and sunk in less than five minutes. She first struck a snag in the bow, which knocked a hole in her bottom and careened her nearly over but immediately struck another which brought her up again. It was not precisely ascertained how many were drowned; but our informant states that Mr. Moore, an old revolutionary soldier, a negro woman and three children, a white infant, whose mother was saved, and a gentleman wearing a Leghorn hat, which was picked up yesterday, could not be found. Two or three gentleman on board were sick, one of whom died yesterday morning near the place of disaster.

Another paper states that five bodies had been found.

Latest from the Mormons.—The last received number of the 'Peoria Register' says, it is known that these people, since their dispersion in Missouri, have collected in great numbers in and around Commerce, in Illinois, on the Mississippi river. The name of Commerce, as we have heretofore stated, they have changed to Nauvoo, from the Hebrew or Egyptian though of the signification of the term we are ignorant.—They hold two great conferences every year: in the spring and fall: and that appointed for the present spring took place last week, commencing on the 6th and ending on the 9th inst. We learn that between 2,000 and 3,000 persons were present, and that considerable accessions were made to the church from the surrounding neighborhood. Our informant states that the number was 74, all received by baptism, and that at the same time thirty of the ablest men were ordained to preach the gospel.—The preachers present were Joseph and Hiram Smith, John Page, Orson Hyde, and two others. Messrs. Page and Hyde, with ten others, (probably chosen elsewhere,) were commissioned to go to the Holy Land to preach the gospel to the Jews. They are to meet in Quincy, next Sabbath, and from thence take their departure for Palestine. About 300 houses have been put up in Nauvoo since last October. Some of them are neat frame buildings, but the greater portion are log cabins, designed for temporary habitations merely. The ground assigned to each is generally one acre, though to some there are five acres. The increase of population by immigration is very great. Our informant states that several families arrived every day. A gentleman living on the road from Quincy to Nauvoo assured him that on some days at least 15 families passed his house, all bound to the latter place.

From South America.—Captain Hutchinson, of the brig Forrest, from Rio Grande, sailed March 21, reports that the Government expedition consisting of nearly three thousand men, had left for Porto Alegre, part by land and part by water, in steam vessels, under Comodore Grenfell. These, with the force already at Porto Alegre, would make about six thousand men. A decisive battle was daily expected.

News fom Monte Video had been received that Gen. Echague had again entered that province with six thousand men to attack Rivera. This we consider doubtful.

Slavers Captured.—The Salem Register states, on the authority of a letter from the American Consul, at Zanzibar, that H. B. Magesty's sloop of war Protest, arrived at Majunga about the 20th of December, from a cruise, having captured the Spanish brig Scorpion, a slaver, with six hundred and seventy slaves on board, which were purchased at Quilamane, and the Portuguese brig Andie, with six slaves on board, bound from Mozambique to Quilamane. The sloop of war sent both the captured slavers to the Cape of Good Hope. The Protest left Majunga the 10th of January for Quilamane river, to arrest the sailing of several slave ships which were loading with slaves at Quilamane, and which the Protest was expecting to capture.

The Season at New Orleans.—As an illustration of the rapid fructifying influence of the climate of Louisania, we will state that strawberries were in market in the latter part of February, blackberries were plentiful two months ago; for a week past plums have been hawked about by every vender of fruits; peaches are half ripe, and figs will be in the market by the middle of May.—N. O. Bee.

Conviction for Violation of the Neutrality Law.—Rensselaer Van Rensselaer, was sentenced to six months imprisonment and fined $250, ~~to stand imprisoned until the~~ fine be paid. It having been satisfactorily shown that he is wholly unable to pay the fine, the President has remitted the same.

William Lyon McKenzie, was sentenced to eighteen months imprisonment, from the 20th of June last, and $10 fine. The residue of his punishment has, we understand, been also remitted by the President.

A Pious Captain in Distress.—The brig Emeline, of Newport, thirty days from Boston, for Texas, was spoken on the 4th inst., off Sand Key Light. She had lost her rudder, jib-boom, and bulwarks, and had her decks swept several days previous, but was determined to proceed to Galveston without putting into any port for repairs.—She was full of passengers, and her commander appeared to be perfectly resigned to his fate, and was last seen reading the Bible.

SUMMARY.

And yet Another.—The Steamboat Mary Express, lying at the wharf at Mobile sunk without any known cause at 3 A. M., April 29. Near morning the Captain was awakened by the sound of rushing water. He started up and found the boat sinking—the cotton already washed overboard. He rushed to the shore, but before he could raise the hands who were sleeping on shore, the boat careened towards the shore, her chimneys fell, her fastenings broke, and she sunk in 35 feet of water. The Captain had not time to save so much as his watch or clothes.

Accident.—The Steamboat New Philadelphia ran foul of the sloop Anna Maria of Trenton, near five mile point on the Delaware, recently, and sunk her. The crew were all saved.

The Steamship British Queen was to have left Portsmouth on the 1st inst. She may be expected at New York in a few days.

Hon. Patrick Noble, late Gov. of S. C., died on the 7th ultimo.

Great Gun.—The largest cannon ever cast in this country has lately been made at the West Point Foundry, by order of Capt. Stockton of the U. S. Navy. It weighs 13 1-2 tons. The bore twelve inches across. The metal was poured in twelve and a half minutes; hundreds of persons witnessing the operation.

A young man by the name of Mc'Laughlin, a carpenter, acting as a marshall at the late National Convention at Baltimore, was struck with a club by some unknown person while the procession was moving, which caused his death immediately. The members of the convention contributed $17,500 for the support of the widow and children, and placed the same in the hands of the President of the Convention for their benefit. The Massachusetts Delegation subscribed and paid $1000.

The body of another man has been found supposed to have been murdered during the Convention; his name had not been ascertained.

Flour.—Flour was selling at Cincinnati on the 26th ult. at 2,93 and $3 a barrel.

Prospects of the Season.—The Lowell Advertiser says that the season is at least two weeks earlier this year than last.—The fruit trees are every where blossoming unusually full, and the prospect is fair for a fruitful season.—Log Cabin.

Encouraging.—There are forty professors of religion in Congress; twenty of whom have formed themselves into a praying circle, which meets every Saturday evening.—Ib.

Sunflour Cigars are manufactured in Philadelphia, and are said to be very pleasant to the taste, while, unlike tobacco, they are decidedly healthy, particularly to consumptive persons.

The taking of the sixth census of the inhabitants of the United States, will commence on the 1st of June.

An Old Printer.—We have at work in our office a printer aged 64, who has worked 47 years at the trade. He served his time with Charles R. and George Webster, in Albany, between 1793 and 1800. He hopes to work some 30 years at the business yet.—Rochester Workingman's Adv.

The Great Western.—The number of letters brought by the Great Western was 11,268.

Rapid Traveling.—A gentleman who has just returned, went from Boston to Cincinnati and back in fifteen days, out of which he stopped five days. This is probably the shortest trip ever made in that place, and, we think, is worthy of record.

More than 200 females were employed six months in manufacturing the lace and veil worn by Queen Victoria at her marriage. Upwards of one hundred years labor for one person was bestowed upon it, for which the scanty pittance of only $4,500 was paid.

"THOU ART GONE TO THE GRAVE."

Thou art gone to the grave! but we will not deplore thee,
Though sorrow and darkness encompass the tomb,
The Savior hath passed through its portals before thee,
And the lamp of his love is thy guide through the gloom.

Thou art gone to the grave! we no longer behold thee,
Nor tread the rough paths of the world by thy side;
But the wide arms of mercy are spread to enfold thee,
And sinners may hope, since the Savior has died.

Thou art gone to the grave! and these mansions forsaking,
Perchance thy weak spirit in doubt linger'd long,
But the sun-shine of heaven beams bright on thy waking,
And the sound thou dost hear is the Seraphim's song.

Thou art gone to the grave! but we will not deplore thee,
Since God was thy ransom, thy guardian and guide;
He gave thee, He took thee, and He will restore thee,
And death has no sting, since the Savior hath died.

DIED,

At Uniontown, Pa, on the 5th ult. of consumption, Dr. GEORGE W. HART, (formerly of this village,) in the 25th year of his age.

Dr. Hart was "the only son of his mother, and she is a widow." And more than this—he was her only child; being left a widow in early life, her affections became the more ardently attached to him. Dr. Hart spent the days of his early childhood at De Ruyter, Madison co. At the age of 13, for the purpose of educating him for the medical profession, his mother removed to Fairfield, Herkimer co. and placed him for literary instruction, under care of Rev. D. Chassel, Principal of the Fairfield Academy, where he remained about five years, and was then connected for three years with the Medical Institution. He journeyed to the South in 1835, and was married to Miss Maria Louisa Bowie, Chambersburg, Pa. He was located in Uniontown the place of his decease. He had many religious impressions from early childhood, and in his last sickness gave evidence that his hope was placed in Jesus. It is in compliance with the special request of his bereaved mother, that I entreat all his former associates to attend to the work of laying up treasure in heaven.

J. R. I.

In Edmeston, on the 12th inst., RHODA, wife of Daniel Coon, Esq., in the 71st year of her age. In her death, her husband has lost a kind and affectionate wife; her children a pious and indulgent mother.—She had been a member of the First S. D. B. Church in Brookfield for many years. Her exit was very sudden and unexpected; probably caused by ulceration or mortification, or both.

Great National Work!

LADIES COMPANION, (established in 1834,) a popular and highly esteemed MAGAZINE OF GENERAL LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS; embellished with Gorgeous and Costly Engravings on Steel, Copper and Wood, the Quarterly Fashions, and also with Fashionable and Popular Music, arranged for the Piano-Forte, Harp and Guitar.

TERMS—$3 a year. Single copies 25 cents.—Office 109 Fulton street, New York.

Mrs. L. H. Sigourney. The publishers are happy to communicate the information to their readers, that arrangements have been effected with this talented lady by which she will still continue to be a regular and constant contributor to the 'Ladies Companion.' Her engagements in other quarters will not interfere with that connection with the 'Companion,' which secures to its readers the enjoyment of her beautiful productions.

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes of Boston, Professor Longfellow of Cambridge College, and Mrs. Anna Maria Wells of Boston, will hereafter contribute to the 'Ladies Companion.'

SPLENDID NEW STEEL ENGRAVINGS by our best artists, accompany each number, illustrated by tales and spirited sketches, which will as heretofore, continue to be magnificent and far superior to those published in any cotemporary work in America.

QUARTERLY FASHIONS.

Plates of the prevailing Fashions appear once every three months, viz. December, March, June and September.

The Ladies Companion contains a larger quantity of reading than any other magazine issued in this country, and its subscription price is only three dollars a year. The great combination of talent secured for the coming year will render it unequalled by any other periodical.

THE MUSICAL DEPARTMENT

This department of the Ladies Companion has ever commanded a large share of attention, and has been looked upon with no little interest by its readers, and more especially the Ladies, whom the publisher is in the highest degree anxious to please.—It will continue to be a subject of more than usual care to him, and to the Professor under whose supervision it is placed, to make that portion of the magazine allotted to Music, more than ever deserving of the countenance of every lover of music.—It has ever been and will continue to be the desire to have all pieces of Music printed correctly and free from errors.

Over every department an equally careful supervision will be strictly exercised by the Editors, and all appropriate expenditures will be liberally bestowed, as it is the design of the publisher, with the aid of his contributors and the advice of his friends to make the Ladies Companion distinguished for beauty and accuracy of its typography—the variety and high tone of its literary articles—and the unequalled splendor of its pictorial Embellishments, which are entirely new and engraved by A. Dick, expressly for the work.

It is the determination of the publisher to use every means to maintain the superiority which the Ladies Companion has obtained. For four years he has steadily pursued a course of improvement, and he flatters himself that his present facilities are such as to give the Ladies Companion eminent advantages over all other publications of its character.

From the foregoing it will be perceived that the Ladies Companion embraces every department within the range of Belles Letters and the Fine Arts; and no exertion or expense will be deemed too great to render the work equal to any other extant. The flattering and general testimonials of nearly every contemporary journal in the United States, and in fact many on the other side of the Atlantic, have strongly asserted the undeniable claims of the Ladies Companion to the support of the public generally. There is no work that gives its readers such a great return for their subscriptions.

TERMS.—$3 a year in advance, or $4 during the year. No subscription received for less than one year.

Complete sets of the volume from May, 1839, can be furnished at the subscription price by applying at the office. All letters must be addressed, post paid, to WILLIAM W. SNOWDEN, 109 Fulton street, N. Y.

CLEAR THE WAY!
I am here Myself among the Rest.

THE subscriber still keeps 'digging' away at Bureaus, Tables, Stands and Bedsteads, and sometimes makes other work that folks want; but he don't think it best to go into a bill of particulars. Suffice it to say, that there will be kept on hand, or made to order, all kinds of Cabinet Ware in his line of business. Having been to some expense in obtaining experienced workmen, (that folks do say can't be beat in getting up things nice,) he would invite those wishing to purchase articles cheap, durable and handsome, to "just drop in" the Ware Room ☞one door east of the Stone Store, and directly opposite the Post Office.

☞Most kinds of Lumber and Produce received in exchange for Furniture, and CASH not refused.

From the Democratic Review.

THE OLD MAN'S COUNSEL.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

Among our hills and valleys, I have known
Wise and grave men, who, with their diligent hands
Tended or gathered in the fruits of earth,
Were reverent learners in the solemn school
Of nature. Not in vain to them were sent
Seed-time and harvest, the vernal shower
That darkened the brown tilth, or snow that beat
On the white winter hills. Each brought, in turn,
Some truth; some lesson on the life of man,
Or recognition of the Eternal Mind
Who veils his glory with the elements.
One such I knew long since; a white haired man,
Pithy of speech and merry when he would;
A genial optimist who daily drew
From what he saw, his quaint moralities.
Kindly he held communion, though so old,
With me, a dreaming boy, and taught me much
That books tell not, and I shall ne'er forget.
The sun of May was bright in middle Heaven,
And steeped the sprouting forests, the green hills
And emerald wheat-fields, in his yellow light.
Upon the apple tree where rosy buds
Stood clustered ready to burst forth in bloom,
The robin warbled forth his full clear note
For hours, and wearied not. Within the woods
Whose young and half transparent leaves scarce cast
A shade, gay circles of anemones
Danced on their stalks; the shad bush, white with flowers
Brightened the glens; the new leaved butternut
And quivering poplar to the roving breeze
Gave a balsamic fragrance. In the fields
I saw the pulses of the gentle wind
On the young grass. My heart was touched with joy
At so much beauty, flushing every hour
Into a fuller beauty; but my friend,
The thoughtful ancient, standing at my side,
Gazed on it mildly sad. I asked him why.
"Well mayst thou join in gladness," he replied,
"With the glad earth her springing plants and flowers,
And this soft wind, the herald of the green
Luxuriant summer. Thou art young like them,
And well mayst thou rejoice. But while the flight
Of seasons fills and knits thy spreading frame,
It withers mine, and thins my hair, and dims
These eyes, whose fading light shall soon be quenched
In utter darkness. Hearest thou that bird!"
I listened, and from 'midst the depth of woods
Heard the low signal of the grouse, that wears
A sable ruff around his mottled neck;
Patridge they call him by our northern streams,
And pheasant by the Delaware. He beat
'Gainst his barred sides his speckled wings, and made
A sound like distant thunder; slow the strokes
At first, then faster and faster till at length
They passed into a murmur and were still.
"There hast thou," said my friend, "a fitting type
Of human life. 'Tis an old truth I know,
But images like these will freshen truth.
Slow pass our days in childhood, every day
Seems like a century; rapidly they glide
In manhood, and in life's decline they fly;
Till days and seasons flit before the mind
As flit the snow-flakes in a winter storm,
Seen rather than distinguished. Ah! I seem
As if I sat within a helpless bark,
By swiftly running waters hurried on
To shoot some mighty cliff. Along the banks
Grove after grove, rock after frowning rock,
Bare sands and pleasant homes, and flowery nooks,
And isles and whirlpools in the stream appear
Each after each, but the devoted skiff
Darts by so swiftly that their images
Dwell not upon the mind, or only dwell
In dim confusion; faster yet I sweep
By other banks and the great gulf is near.
Wisely my son, while yet thy days are long,
And this fair change of seasons passes slow,
Gather and treasure up the good they yield;
All that they teach of virtue, of pure thoughts
And kind affections, reverence for thy God
And for thy brethren; so when thou shalt come
Into these barren years that fleet away
Before their fruits are ripe, thou may'st not bring,
A mind unfurnished and a withered heart."
Long since that white haired ancient slept, but still
When the red flower buds crowd the orchard bough,
And the ruffed grouse is drumming far within
The woods, his venerable form again
Is at my side, his voice is in my ear.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE TREMBLING EYE-LID.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

It was the day before Christmas, in the year 1778, that during our war of the revolution, an armed vessel sailed out of the port of Boston. She was strongly built, and carried twenty guns, with a well appointed crew of more than a hundred, and provisions for a cruise of six months. As she spread her broad white sails, and steered from the harbor with a fair fresh breeze, she made a noble appearance. Many throbbing hearts breathed a blessing on her voyage, for she bore a company of as bold and skilful seamen as ever dared the perils of the deep. But soon the north wind blew, and brought a heavy sea into the bay. The night proved dark and they came to anchor with difficulty near the harbor of Plymouth. The strong gale that buffetted them became a storm, and the storm a hurricane.

Snow fell, and the cold was terribly severe. The vessel was driven from her moorings, and struck on a reef of rocks. She began to fill with water, and they were obliged to cut away her masts. The sea rose above the main deck sweeping over it at every surge. They made every exertion that courage could prompt or hardihood endure. But so fearful were the wind and cold, that the stoutest man was not able to strike more than two blows in cutting away the mast without being relieved by another. The wretched people thronged together upon the quarter deck, which was crowded almost to suffocation. They were exhausted with toil and suffering, but could obtain neither provisions nor fresh water. They all were covered by the deep sea when the vessel became a wreck. But unfortunately the crew got access to ardent spirits, and many of them drank to intoxication. Insubordination, mutiny and madness ensued. The officers remained clear minded, but lost all authority over the crew, who raved around them. A more frightful scene can scarcely be imagined. The dark sky, the raging storm, the waves breaking wildly over the rocks, and threatening every moment to swallow up the broken vessel, and the half frozen beings who maintained their icy hold on life, lost to reason and to duty, or fighting fiercely with each other. Some lay in disgustful stupidity, others, with fiery faces, blasphemed God. Some in temporary delirium fancied themselves in palaces surrounded by luxury, and brutally abused the servants who they supposed refused to do their biddings. Others there were who amid the beating of that pitiless temptest, believed themselves in the home that they never more must see, and with hollow, reproachful voices, besought bread, and wondered why water was withheld from them by the hands that were most dear. A few whose worse passions were quickened by alchohol to a fiend-like fury, assaulted or wounded those who came in their way, making shrieks of defiance, and their curses heard above the roar of the storm. Intemperance never displayed itself in more distressing attitudes. At length, Death began to do his work. The miserable creatures fell dead every hour upon the deck, being frozen stiff and hard. Each corpse as it became breathless, was laid upon the heap of dead, that more space might be left for the survivors. Those who drank most freely were the first to perish. On the third day of these horrors, the inhabitants of Plymouth, after making many ineffectual attempts, reached the wreck, not without danger. What a melancholy spectacle!—Lifeless bodies stiffened in every form that suffering could devise. Many lay in a vast pile. Others sat with their hands reclining on their knees; others grasping the ice-covered ropes; some in a posture of defence like the dying gladiator; others with hands held up to Heaven, as if deprecating their fate. Orders were given to search earnestly for every mark or sign of life.—One boy was distinguished among the mass of dead, only by the trembling of one of his eye-lids. The poor survivors were kindly received into the houses of the people of Plymouth, and every effort used for their restoration. The captain and lieutenant and a few others, who had abstained from the use of ardent spirits, survived. The remainder were buried, some in separate graves, and others in a large pit, whose hollow is still to be seen on the south west side of the burial ground in Plymouth. The funeral obsequies were most solemn. When the clergyman who was to perform the last service, first entered and saw more than seventy dead bodies some fixing upon him their stony eyes, and others with faces stiffened into the horrible expression of their last mortal agony, he was so affected as to faint.

Some were brought on shore alive and received every attention, but survived only a short time. Others were restored after long sickness, but with their limbs so injured by the frost, as to become cripples for life.

In a village at some distance from Plymouth, a widowed mother, with her daughter, were constantly attending a couch on which lay a sufferer. It was the boy whose trembling eye-lid attracted the notice of pity, as he lay among the dead.

"Mother," he said, in a feeble tone, "God bless you for having taught me to avoid ardent spirits. It was this that saved me. After those around me grew intoxicated, I had enough to do to protect myself from them. Some attacked and dared me to fight. Others pressed the poisonous draft to my lips and bade me drink. My lips and throat were parched with thirst. But I knew if I drank with them, I must lose my reason as they did, and perhaps blaspheme my Maker.

"One by one, they died, these poor infuriated wretches. Their shrieks and groans still seem to ring in my ears. It was in vain that the captain and other officers, and a few good men, warned them what would ensue, if they thus continued to drink—and tried every method in their power to restore them to order. They still fed upon the intoxicating liquor. They grew delirious—they died in heaps.

"Dear mother, our sufferings from hunger and cold you cannot imagine. After my feet were frozen, but before I lost the use of my hands, I discovered a box among fragments of the wreck, far under the water. I toiled with a rope to drag it up. But my strength was not sufficient. A comrade, who was still able to move a little, assisted me. At length it came within our reach. We hoped that it might contain bread, and took courage. Uniting our strength we burst it open. It contained only a few bottles of olive oil, yet we gave God thanks. For we found that by occasionally moistening our lips with it, and swallowing a little it allayed the gnawing, burning pain in the stomach. Then my comrade died, and I laid beside him as one dead, surrounded by corpses. Presently, the violence of the temptest that had long raged subsided—and I heard quick footsteps and strange voices amid the wreck where we lay. They were the blessed people of Plymouth, who had dared every danger to save us. They lifted in their arms and wrapped in blankets all who could speak. Then they earnestly sought all who could move. But every drunkard was among the dead. And I was so exhausted with toil and suffering and cold, that I could not stretch a hand to my deliverers. They passed me again and again. They carried the living to the boat. I feared that I was left behind. Then I prayed earnestly in my heart, 'O Lord, for the sake of my widowed mother, for the sake of my dear sister, save me.' Methought the last man had gone, and I besought the Redeemer to receive my spirit. But I felt a warm breath on my face. I strained every nerve. My whole soul strove and shuddered within me. Still my body was as immoveable as marble. Then a loud voice said, 'Come back and help me out with this poor lad. One of his eye-lids tremble—he lives.' Oh the music of that sweet voice to me. The trembling eye-lid, the prayer to God and your lessons of temperance, my mother, saved me."

Then the loving sister embraced him with tears and the mother said, "Praise be to Him who hath spared my son to be the comfort of my age."

Iowa is so called from its principal river.

Oregon is so called from its principal river.

THE LATE STEPHEN BURROUGHS.—He resided, for many years, in Shipton, Lower Canada, on the banks of the noble river St. Francis, where he married at the age of about sixty, a charming black-eyed girl of nineteen, who in about a twelvemonth after the knot was tied, presented her aged but loving lord with as fine and healthy a baby as ever filled a father's heart with joy. He supported himself and little family, for several years, by receiving and educating, at his residence, young lads, the sons of wealthy gentlemen of Montreal, Three Rivers, Quebec, and other places. These young lads looked up to their aged tutor—who had an exceedingly happy tact of imparting knowledge to his pupils—as to a kind father, and, at the expiration of their studies, quitted his pleasant dwelling with the utmost regret. Although the morning and noon of his life was cloudy and forbidding, the evening was blameless and peaceful. Reformation never got hold of a harder customer than when she took Stephen Burroughs in hand, and never did she perform her work more completely and effectually. His many virtues will ever be remembered with feelings of pleasure by those who knew him well during the best, though far too small portion of his long life.—Boston Transcript.

PORTRAIT OF WHITEFIELD.—He was something above the middle stature, well proportioned though at that time slender, and remarkable for a native gracefulness of manner; his complexion very fair, his features regular, his eyes small and lively, of a dark blue color; in recovering from the measles, he had contracted a squint with one of them; but this peculiarity in no way lessened the expressive sweetness of his countenance. His voice excelled both in melody and compass, and its fine modulations were happily accompanied by that grace of action, which he possessed in an eminent degree, and which has been said to be the chief requisite of an orator.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

From the Youths Cabinet.

THE SUTTEE—OR BURNING OF A WIDOW.

'Mother,' said little Clarissa Williams, 'there was a collection taken up for the heathen to-day. What do the heathen want of money?'

'The money is not to be given to the heathen, my child,' said Mrs. Williams. 'It is used to support missionaries and their families who go to teach the heathen.'

C. Why should we pay for teaching the heathen?'

Mrs. W. I will read a little from the Missionary Chronicle, and then you will see that they need teaching, and that all christians should be willing to go without many comforts for the sake of sending the gospel to them.

The burning of widows with the dead bodies of their husbands, has lately been prohibited by the civil authorities of British India. But the native princes, in most of their territories, where they have the power, permit the practice to exist, and it is still continued in their province; and nothing but the influence of the gospel will remove the root of the evil. It is most painful to describe these dreadful murders, but mercy to these suffering victims requires that the extent of their misery be known.

The Rev. J. England, in 1926, thus describes a suttee which he witnessed.

"On reaching the spot, I found a large concourse of spectators assembled. On the left stood the horrible pile; it was about ten feet long, seven wide and three feet high. At each corner a rough stake eight feet in length, was driven into the ground; and at a foot from the top, a frame of the same dimensions was fastened by cords.—This frame was covered with small dry faggots, which the Brahmins continued to throw upon, till they rose two feet above the frame work. On the right sat the poor deluded widow.

"She was attended by a dozen or more Brahmins; her mother, and sister, and son, (an interesting boy about three years of age,) and other relatives were also with her. Her own infant, not twelve months old, was carefully kept from her by the Brahmins. She had already performed a number of preparatory ceremonies; her eyes indicated a degree of melancholy wildness; a forced and unnatural smile now and then played on her countenance, and every thing about her person and conduct indicated that narcotics had been administered in no small quantities.

"The Rev. Mr. Campbell addressed her in the Carnatic language, but the effect of his address was counteracted by the influence of the Brahmins. Muntrous (prayers or incantations) having been repeated over the pile, the corpse was laid on the right side, and four men furnished with swords, and at each corner now drew them from their scabbards. The trembling, ghastly offering to the Moloch of Hindooism, then made her seven circuits round the fatal pile, and finally halted opposite her husband's corpse, greatly agitated. Five or six Brahmins began to talk to her with much vehemence, till, in a paroxysm of desperation, assisted by the Brahmins, the helpless widow ascended the bed of destruction.

"Her mother and sister too stood by, weeping and agonized; but all was vain. The devoted woman then proceeded to disengage the rings from her fingers, wrists, and ears; her murderers stretched out their greedy hands to receive them. While in the act of taking a ring from her ear, her mother in the deepest anguish, went to the side of the pile and entreated that the horrid purpose might be abandoned; but the woman without uttering a word, or even casting a parting glance at her supplicating parent and sister, threw herself down upon the pile, and clasped the corpse in her arms. Straw in abundance was heaped on the dead and living; and gums, rosins, and other inflammable substances, were thrown upon the straw. Fire was applied in different places, and the whole was soon in a blaze. The men with swords at each corner cut the cords which supported the canopy of faggots. It fell, and covered the lifeless corpse and the living woman! A piercing sound caught my ear, and notwithstanding the noise of the multitude, I heard the shrieks of misery which issued from the burning pile. The whole was now enveloped in flames, and so intense was the heat, that the Brahmins and spectators retreated several paces. They then sung a Sanscrit hymn; the hymn ended, but not the shrieks and groans of the agonized sufferer. Scarcely conscious of what I did, I left the scene of fiendish barbarity.'

After hearing this read, what do you suppose Clarissa offered to do for the Missionary society? Reader, if you had been in her place, what would you do?

"If youth were to come again," said an aged gentleman, "I would be a scholar." Aye; and how many more would be? What a useful hint is this to youth. If every youth would keep in view the fact that 'sixty minutes make an hour,' how much wiser than the past would be the rising generation?

Illustrations of Prophecy.

BY DAVID CAMPBELL.

No. 9, Washington Street, Boston.

THIS work of above 400 pages 18 mo. just published, embraces many of the views of distinguished writers on the prophecies of Daniel, and John, together with some of no small value found in no other work. It is prepared as the reader will see, with unusual advantages of imparting to the eye the resemblance of the natural emblems used by the prophets. These will interest many of the young, especially to investigate the prophecies, which they have hitherto regarded as a sealed book; and with the geography of the prophecies, and chronological calculations peculiar to this work; it will afford much help to understand these parts of the Bible.—It also shows the erroneous ground of some modern propagators of an old but startling theory, that the 'end of all things is at hand.' Should the reader fail to find that fulness desirable, yet, from so brief a dissertation, he will find much to gratify and instruct. It is a work demanded by the present exigency of the public mind, and is written with a good spirit, giving sober common sense views on matters of great interest.

The work contains 150 pictoral illustrations colored according to the description of the prophets price $1,00. An Appendix in form of an Atlas, is prepared to accompany the work, which gives a view of countries, in which predicated events have taken place, and which are to take place; also large diagrams and chronological tables, entirely original in their arrangements. One of these plates, throws the entire chronology of the apocalypse upon one square, to page with the seals, trumpets, and vials arranged in the most skilful manner exhibiting symmetry and beauty, as well as harmony of numbers.

☞Editors who insert the above notice, will be entitled to a copy of the work and atlas, by ordering them from No. 9 Washington street, Boston, 125 Fulton street, New-York.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

EDITED BY AN ASSOCIATION OF MINISTERS.

VOLUME I. DEVOTED TO RELIGION, LITERATURE, AND GENERAL INTELLIGENCE. PUBLISHED BY GREENE, CAMPBELL, AND BURDICK.

DE RUYTER, MADISON COUNTY, N. Y., THIRD-DAY, MAY 26, 1840. NUMBER 12.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Register.

We insert with pleasure the following communication from the Rev. J. R. Johnson, Pastor of the Presbyterian Church in this village.—EDS.

To the Editors of the Register.

BRETHREN—Any effort made, in accordance with christian principles, to educate the youth of our country, deeply interests me. Consequently, for the seven months that I have been a resident of this village, I have carefully noticed the De Ruyter Institute, and have had the pleasure of making myself acquainted with the teachers, and many of the students. I am highly pleased with the Institute. The teachers are pious, systematic, laborious, and apt to teach. The school affords all the facilities for acquiring an education which are mentioned in the advertisement that occasionally appears in the Register.

The Principal and his assistants evidently aim at giving thorough and useful instruction, and they manifest no disposition to make an effort for mere display. I am now highly gratified to learn that the Institution embraces an increased number of students from the village; this I anticipated from the impression which was made upon the community at the last two examinations.

Through your paper I invite youth in the adjacent towns, and from a distance, to come and make trial of the advantages of the De Ruyter Institute. This village affords a pleasant retreat from the cities during the warm season. Situated about midway on the stage route from Utica to Ithaca, and containing about eighty-five dwelling houses, and above one hundred families, it affords opportunity for the student to enjoy society as much as is for his good, and to have ready intercourse by mail with his friends, and with the moving world; while he is guarded from the temptations that would assail him in larger places, and especially in those which are situated upon the great thoroughfares.

It may not be amiss to say, that those who wish to observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, cannot be placed under influences, in that respect, more desirable to themselves; and those who observe the first day, can enjoy religious worship on that day, as the Baptist, Methodist, and Presbyterian churches, each now enjoy the stated preaching of the gospel.

I make this communication, not in compliance with any request or suggestion from any source, but simply from the impulse of my own feelings, that I may do something the interests of the friends of institution of learn- has loca- to

RELIGIOUS.

From the New York Observer.

MY SON, GIVE ME THY HEART.

Here is the skeleton of a sermon, and a beautiful one, if beauty may belong to a skeleton. It is not altogether original; but it strikes me as a happy train of thought, and I suggest it for the young. My son give me thy heart.

The text naturally presents the following topics for remark.

I. The relation in which God stands to the individual addressed. He speaks,

1. Not as to a stranger. Man has alienated himself from God and apostatized and lived at a distance from him so long, that it would be right for God to treat him as an alien from the commonwealth of Israel, and a stranger to the covenant of promise. And when these wanderers are reclaimed, the inspired writer saith concerning them, "Ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow citizens with the saints, and of the household of God."

2. Not as to an enemy. The sinner is indeed an enemy of God. He hates him with perfect hatred. The carnal mind is enmity against God, not at enmity, but its very nature is hostile to holiness and all holy beings. But when God addressed the sinner he does not speak to him as an enemy; nor,

3. As a slave. The sinner is a slave; a slave to his own lusts, to the wicked world, to the enemy of souls. He ought to be the servant of God. Know ye not saith the apostle that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are. But God does not speak to him as to a stranger or to an enemy, or to a servant, but he saith,

4. My son! Could any thing on earth or in heaven be more tender. The father, God, addresses poor sinful man, and invites him, not by an earthly parent's love, no, not by a mother's love, but by the love of heaven, to give him his heart.

II. The nature of the request. God does not ask him,

1. To lend his heart. He seeks not that fickle love that to-day is warm, and to-morrow cold as the grave. If the covenant he makes is not an everlasting covenant, he would make none at all. Multitudes are willing to lend themselves to the Lord, to serve him for a little time and then return to the world. God asks no such love. Nor does he ask him,

2. To sell him his heart. True, God has promised heaven, and thrones, and crowns, and joys eternal, as the sinner's portion, when he comes back. But not as a bribe. The sinner ought to give God his heart if there were no salvation for him. The devil ought to love God now, though no Savior died for him. But God does ask him,

3. To give him his heart. The surrender must be voluntary. Gold cannot buy love. Fear cannot compel love. The sinner must freely consecrate himself soul and body, a living sacrifice unto God. It is his reasonable service.

III. To whom must the sinner make this surrender.

1. Not to the world. With all diligence, and in spite of all divine commands, the world will get too much of the heart. But it is as foolish as wicked to set the heart on the world. It is vain and transitory. The dearest objects fade the soonest. Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world.

2. Not to the devil. He seeks the soul. He would have the sinner yield himself into his hands, and he promises him a reward. But resist the devil.

3. Nor keep it yourself. Give your heart to some object worthy of its love. Be not selfish and centre your desires on your own pleasure. Love something else. But God says,

4. Give me thy heart. Give it to him who gave himself for you.

IV. What is the gift.

1. Not the property.
2. Not the body.
3. Not friends.
4. But your heart. Give God the heart and he will have all the rest. IRENÆUS.

From the Christian Mirror.

"THEY THAT BE WHOLE, NEED NOT A PHYSICIAN, BUT THEY THAT ARE SICK."

Sin is very fitly compared to a disease by the sacred writers. Literal disease does not more truly disorder the corporal system, disturb the animal functions, induce languor, suffering and death, unless removed, than sin does produce analagous effects on man's moral nature. The latter is as fatal to the soul, as the former is to the body. But alas, it is more secret and subtile in its operations. Often, it is perpetrating its deadly work, when the victim of its malignant power is but slightly conscious of its existence. The heart is hardened, its sensibilities are blunted through the deceitfulness of sin.

The sick man feels his energies failing, becomes more or less alarmed for his safety, despairs of recovery from any application of his own resources alone, before he applies to a physican. So a man must be convicted of sin, feel that it is the disease of his soul, tending rapidly to his utter and everlasting destruction, before he will apply for healing to the infallible physician.

The sick man, who is alarmed for the issue of a disease which has baffled all his efforts and skill to check, when he physician, submits to his treat- his prescriptions without gainsaying, however nauseous, however long repeated, and whatever the temporary pain may cost him. Not unlike this, is the case of the convinced sinner, when he applies to Christ, the physician of the soul.—He despairs of cure from his own efforts. He submits unreservedly to Christ. He no longer dictates terms to the Saviour.—His language is, "Do with me, as shall seem good in thy sight. Lay me ever so low, I will submit; inflict what pain thou wilt, I will bear it. Prescribe a portion ever so bitter, I will drink it. Let Christ do by me as he pleases, if he do but remove my guilt, nothing can come unwelcome from his hand. I will not quarrel with him for a right eye, or a right hand, or any thing dear to me in this world."

The parallel will not hold any further.—The fullest submission to the directions of him who prescribes for bodily disease will not infallibly secure recovery, the case may baffle the greatest human skill and disappoint the tenderest human compassion.—But no such contingency attends entire and hearty submission to the Physician of souls. He is able to save to the uttermost. He has affirmed that he will turn none away who come to him. His own truth and promise insures their salvation. "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

From the Church of England Magazine.

SEEKING THE LORD.

"To-morrow I will seek the Lord,"
The foolish heart will say;
To-morrow may no life afford—
So seek the Lord to-day.

Seek him while yet he will be found—
Seek him from early youth—
Seek him in all his works around,
And in his page of truth.

Seek him with all your might and mind—
Seek him with holy care—
Seek him in thoughts of heavenly kind—
Seek him in praise and prayer.

Seek him when your delights decay,
And when they flourish, seek;
Seek him on every Sabbath-day,
And through the passing week.

Seek him; and him you soon shall find,
And own how blest are they
Who put the morrow from the mind,
To seek the Lord to-day.

CONSIDERATIONS IN COMPANY.

1. Consider, O my soul, that, perhaps, some in this company may be lying under the wrath of God. Should I not do something for such?

2. Some may be acting inconsistent with the gospel, and although I know not, yet, if I am spiritual, something may drop, which will reach them indirectly.

3. Consider that, perhaps, some of the company may be halting between two opinions, and waiting for the sanction of thy example to determine them in some things; but wo to thee if thou doest or sayest any thing which will encourage to evil, or to a luke-warm profession.

4. Some in this company may be beginning religion,—tempted, wounded, or persecuted, and discouraged. Should not something be said which has a tendency to counteract these evils?

5. Consider what views thou didst have of those ministers who did not converse profitably in company,—avoid this evil.

6. Some who are sitting around me at tea, or dinner, &c., may be near to eternity: perhaps this may be the last company they will ever be in.

7. What, if this be the last opportunity I shall ever have of doing good?—am I improving it? What, if the chilly hand of death, in the midst of this company, stop the springs of life? What if the hour of thy departure should come in this place—art thou suitably employed?

8. Would Jesus and his Apostles;—would Brainard, Whitefield, &c. have been HERE IN THIS company? Would they say what I am saying, or do what I am doing? N. B. Perhaps, my soul, God has gathered this company together to give thee an opportunity for usefulness. Also, I may be sure that my being IN THIS company will tend to answer some end, either to HARDEN OR RECLAIM, TO DEADEN OR TO QUICKEN, to good or evil.—Dr. Milne.

THOUGHTS BEFORE PREACHING.

1. Remember, O my soul, that thou art now to plead the cause of Christ therefore be fervent.

2. Remember, that some who shall hear me to-day will, perhaps, be in heaven or hell before another opportunity, therefore be faithful.

3. Some are remarkably ignorant, therefore be very plain.

4. Some are captious, therefore be cautious.

5. Some, perhaps, are beginning, tried, tempted, desponding; therefore seek to direct them.

6. What if I never preach again? therefore be as serious as if I were going from the pulpit to the bed of death.—Dr. Milne.

I do not like to hear professors when they meet for the worship of God, talking about their farms or ir merchandize; they seem to h heir errand.

FOR PARENTS.

From the Mother's Magazine.

GOVERNMENT OF CHILDREN.

Mrs. W.—By publishing the following extract of a letter from an aged and highly respected clergyman to his daughter, on the GOVERNMENT OF CHILDREN, you will oblige some of your subscribers, and confer a benefit on the community of mothers.

Yours, &c. F. L. S.

——"I have not time to go into a full treatise on family government, but will lay down the following rules for your daily and prayerful examination.

1. Exercise your authority as seldom as possible, and instead of it employ kind persuasion and deliberate reasoning; but when you exercise it, make it absolute and irresistible.

2. Be careful how you threaten, but never lie. Threaten seldom, but never fail to execute. The parent who is open-mouthed to threaten, and threatens hastily, but is irresolute to punish, and when the child is not subdued by the first threat, repeats it half a dozen times with a voice of increased violence, and with many shakes and twitches of the little culprit, will certainly possess no authority.

3. Avoid tones and gestures expressive of agitation for trivial matters indicative of no depravity, and indicating only the heedlessness of forgetfulness of children, or perhaps nothing more than is common to all young animals, a love to use their limbs.—In all such cases the tones should be kind and persuasive, rather than authoritative; and the severity and even the gravity of authority should be reserved exclusively for cases of disobedience or depravity, or for the prevention of serious evil. A perpetual fretting at children for little things, will inevitably harden their hearts and totally destroy parental authority and influence.—There never was a fretting parent, who often threatened and seldom performed, that had a particle of efficient government.

4. Establish the unchanging habit of not commanding a child but once. Cost what it may, break the child down to obedience to the first command. And when this is once done, if you are careful never to let disobedience escape punishment of some kind or other, and punishment that shall be effectual and triumphant, you will find it not difficult to maintain your absolute authority."

RESOLUTIONS.

1. As my soul is immortal, I will value it as vastly more important than my body, which must die—consecrating the powers and faculties of both, to the service and glory of my great Creator, Preserver, and bountiful Benefactor.

2. I will endeavor, by the aid of the Holy Spirit and by prayer, to eradicate the evil propensities and affections of my heart, substituting in their place right desires and affections, striving after higher attainments in personal holiness.

3. I will strive to improve my mind in the knowledge of the great doctrines and duties of the Gospel of Jesus Christ,—striving to retain in my memory and in my heart, all those truths which I hear dispensed from Sabbath to Sabbath, and that knowledge which I may derive from books. I will seek to converse upon all the various topics presented to my consideration, and pray that all such means may be sanctified to my temporal and spiritual improvement; that thus I may be qualified to be useful to my fellow men.

4. I will not only endeavor to speak evil of none, but on the contrary I will strive to be kind to every body, giving honor to whom honor is due, treating every human being as a neighbor, and, as far as practicable, as a friend.

5. I will scrupulously avoid conformity to the follies and extreme fashions of this world. When invited to parties of pleasure, or places of public resort, I will ask myself, "Shall I, by compliance, be likely at this time to increase my spirituality, or to benefit the souls of my fellow men; and I will endeavor to act in conformity to the dictates of conscience and the word of God," on every such occasion.

6. I will be constant and punctual in attending upon the means of grace—the sanctuary, the prayer-meeting, the weekly lecture, the monthly concert, the Sabbath-school teachers' meeting, and other occasional meetings; and I will allow myself no excuse for absences, extraordinaries excepted.

7. In all my conversation and intercourse with my friends, I will seek for fit opportunities to introduce subjects of a religious nature, seeking to make them experimental and searching. I will at no time, and in no company, allow myself to engage in conversation upon idle or frivolous subjects.

8. I will strive to be active in promoting the cause of benevolence; but I will engage in nothing that will be likely to render me censorious, or suspicious of the motives of others.

9. As I may die suddenly and soon, I will, in the secret place of prayer, read over and meditate upon these resolutions every Sabbath morning or evening. Trusting in the covenant mercy and grace of God, and the blood of sprinkling to make me faithful, I will seek to be actually and habitually ready for death, judgment, and eternity.

FOR THE SAILOR.

From the N. Y. Observer.

PRAYER AT THE MAST HEAD.

A sailor recently returned from a whaling voyage, and in conversation with a pious friend, spoke of the enjoyment which he had in prayer while afar on the deep. "But," inquired his friend, "in the midst of the confusion on ship-board where could you find a place to pray?" "Oh," said he, "I always went to the mast head." I have heard of closets in various places, but never in one more peculiar than this. Peter went upon the house-top to pray. Our blessed Lord prayed upon the mountain top. Others have sought the shades of the forest. I remember hearing of a youth who came home from the camp during the last war, and his pious mother asked him, "Where, John, could you find a place to pray?" He answered, "Where there is a heart to pray, mother, it is easy to find a place."

And yet the sailor's closet was a favored spot. The ear of man could not hear him as he cried mightily unto God. The gales that wafted his ship on its voyage, would bear his petitions upward toward the throne. "The voice of many waters" would be the music of his sanctuary, and the angels that had charge concerning him, would listen to the swelling song. As he lifted up his heart and his voice in prayer, he was surrounded with the majesty and glory of his Maker. The "deep, deep sea" spread its illimitable expanse around him. The heavens, spread out like the curtains of Jehovah's chamber, and the stars, like the jewels that adorn His crown, hung over him as he climbed the giddy mast, and bowed down to pray. Perhaps he had little imagination, and entered not into the granduer of the scene around him. But he had a soul; a soul that felt the power of God; that loved high and holy communion with the Father of spirits, and while others below were rioting in the mirth of a sailor's jovial life, his joy was literally to rise above the world and find intercourse with heaven.

What peace must have filled that sailor's heart. The storms might "rudely toss his foundering bark," but they could not shake his confidence in God. The ocean might yawn beneath him to swallow him in its fathomless depth; but he was sheltered in the bosom of his Father's love. The frail bark might be driven at the mercy of the winds, or be dashed on the rocks, or stranded on the shore, but he had a hope that was an ANCHOR to the soul, both sure and steadfast, entering into that within the vail. Through the thickest darkness that enveloped him, the "star of bethlehem" shed its celestial loveliness over his path in the trackless deep, and guided him onward and upward to the haven of eternal rest. Thitherward from the mast-head he strained his eye, and true as the needle to the pole, he pursued his way; when tempted he sought the mast-head to pray; when in despondency, at the mast-head he found joy; when the taunts of his profane companions filled his ear with pain and his soul with grief, he fled to the mast-head, and poured out the desires of his heart into the ear of him who hears the humblest suppliants that cry.

I love to think of this sailor. I wish I knew him, and could kneel down with him and hear him converse with God. How few would be as faithful as he! How many would neglect their closet and seldom pray in secret, unless they could have a more sacred chamber than the mast of a wave-rocked whaler. But He, "who when here a sailor's pillow pressed," walks now on the mighty deep, and when the tempest-tossed mariner cries, He answers "it is I, be not afraid." IRENÆUS.

FOR THE SABBATH KEEPER.

From the Christian Secretary.

THEY BEGAN TO MAKE EXCUSE.

Christian reader, do you always attend meeting on the Sabbath? Is your seat in the house of God invariably occupied by yourself? Are you promptly at your post whenever the sacramental host is marshalled? To these questions we can anticipate a variety of answers. And now, my dear brethren and sisters, don't throw down the paper and say the writer is impertinent; that he has no business to ask such questions, &c., &c.; but first give him a candid hearing. By the way, do you take the Secretary? If not, just borrow it and read this piece, and then go and subscribe, and pay for it in advance. Don't "begin to make excuse"—you will never regret it—for to an humble, devoted, and Christ-loving Christian, the revival inteligence is worth more than all the political matter there is published.

But to return to our question. Do you constantly attend upon the public services of the sanctuary? "Why," says one, "I must certainly regard it a duty; and ought to esteem it a privilege to assemble with the people of God on the Sabbath, but—I am not always present. Sometimes I am so fatigued with the labors of the preceding week, that I do not feel able to go. Sometimes it is cloudy or foggy, and "looks so much like rain" that I dare not venture out, lest I should "take cold." And if I am out of health, it frequently happens to be on the Sabbath; so that, on the whole, I cannot get to meeting very constantly."

Another always goes when they have a "new minister," or there is a baptizing—or some are to be added to the church—and, perhaps, occasionally, on a very pleasant day, when there is likely to be a good many people out. There are some who live so "far off," (though, perhaps, not more than a mile or two;) that they seem to feel justified in staying at home a part of the time.

One does not like the minister very well—he speaks too low, or too loud, too fast, or too slow—or he is so tall, or so short, &c. Another has a very ineligible, uncomfortable seat—and another stays at home because he cannot afford to procure one.

It were an endless task to notice all the excuses and apologies made by professing Christians for absenting themselves from the public worship of God on the Sabbath! But I have a word or two for those who are begining to make excuses.

It is your indispensable duty to be found in the congregation of those who keep holy day, unless it is absolutely impossible.

1. It is a duty you owe to God. You believe he requires you religiously to observe the Sabbath devoting its hours to his service. You believe that the preaching of the gospel is one of Christ's institutions—a means of converting sinners—and promoting the Christian's growth in grace.—And will God bless you with the light of his countenance while you voluntarily forsake the assemblies of the saints? and absent yourself from the place where he has promised to meet with his people?

2. It is a duty you owe your covenant brethren. You have solemnly promised to walk with them in all the ordinances and institutions of Christ's house. You have covenanted to watch over them—to pray with and for them—to bless and encourage them—and to sustain your share of the common burdens. And how are these obligations met, when in consequence of your absence from the house of God, no opportunity is given for you and your brethren to "speak often" to each other? When the hearts of your brethren are more frequently made sad by your absence, than glad by your presence?

3. You are under obligations to your pastor. Is it his duty to preach the gospel from Sabbath to Sabbath? And is it not your duty to hear? Suppose his place should frequently be vacant—would such excuses and apologies as you make, be satisfactory in his case? Do you reply "he is paid for his services, and therefore under obligation to be there?" But are you willing to pay him for preaching to your meeting-house? or do you employ him for your own benefit? And how can his labors in the sanctuary profit you unless you are there? But again: Are you treating him as a servant of the Most High God, or even as a "brother beloved," while neglecting to attend upon his ministrations? Supposing all were to do as you do how often would he have a congregation to preach to?

4. You are also under obligations to impenitent sinners around you. The preaching of the gospel is the instituted means of saving souls. "By the foolishness of preaching, God is pleased to save those who believe." And you profess to desire the salvation of all who are out of Christ. And are you not bound to do all in your power, to bring them under the influence of the gospel?

But how can you say to them, "come go with us," when you seldom go to the house of God yourself? And how can you expect your worldly neighbors will revere God's institutions, while you are practically disregarding him?

Professed disciple of Christ, ponder well your paths. The world are gazing at you. Your faithfulness and consistency will be a means of their conviction; or your indifference may shield them from the influence of truth, and lull them to sleep in their sins. O, then, let them see by your faithful devotion to the cause of Christ, that you "love the gates of Zion," and that the "tabernacles of the Most High" are amiable in your eyes. S. B.

CHRISTIAN EQUANIMITY.—As oft as I hear the robin-redbreast chant it as cheerfully in September, the beginning of winter, as in March, the approach of the summer, why should not we (think I) give as cheerful entertainments to the hoary frosty hairs of our age's winter as to the primroses of our youth's spring? Why not to the declining sun in adversity, as (like Persians) to the rising sun of prosperity? I am sent to the ant to learn industry; to the dove to learn innocency; to the serpent to learn wisdom; and why not this bird to learn equanimity and patience, and to keep the same tenor of my mind's quietness, as well at the approach of calamity's winter as of the spring of happiness? And, since the Roman's constancy is so commended, who changed not his countenance with his changed fortunes, why should not I, with a Christian resolution, hold a steady course in all weathers, and though I be forced with cross-winds, and my sails catch at side-winds, yet skilfully to steer, and keep on my course, till I arrive at the haven of eternal happiness.—Warwick's Spare Minutes.

THE MINISTRY.—The ministry of things divine is a function which, as God himself did institute, so neither may men undertake the same but by authority and power given them in lawful manner. They are therefore, ministers of God, not only by way of subordination, as princes and civil magistrates, whose execution of judgment and justice the supreme hand of Divine Providence doth uphold; but minister of God, as from whom their authority is derived, and not from men.—Hooker.

How often do we sigh for the opportunities of doing good, whilst we neglect the openings of Providence in things, which would frequently lead to the accomplishment of most important usefulness! Dr. Johnson used to say, "He who waits to do a great deal of good at once will never do any." Good is done by degrees. However small in proportion the benefit which follows individual attempts to do good, a great deal may be accomplished by perseverance.

CHRIST REJECTED.

But few, if any, who believe in the validity of the scriptures, can look upon the conduct of the Jews in rejecting Christ with any feeling of approbation, but are ready to pronounce the judgments of God, which have fallen upon them as a Nation, to be a righteous visitation of an offended Heaven for their hard-hearted and willful rejection of the Messiah. To such it is not only a matter of astonishment, that while on earth they would not acknowledge him, but that they should continue to reject him, when the truth of his Messiahship is so well authenticated, and the consequences of this rejection to them, as a nation, so fearful.

Notwithstanding the rejection of Christ by the Jews, as a nation, has been attended with so many fearful consequences, the sin of rejecting him, as individuals, is no more aggravating in an unbelieving Jew than in a Gentile who acknowledges him to be the Messiah, and yet rejects him. Can we, by any process of reasoning, show the sin of that person to be less sinful who believes Christ to be the true Messiah, and rejects him as such, than the sin of him who through blindness rejects him as a deceiver? We think not. The ultimate consequences are the same; for neither will come unto him that they may have life. The Lord Jesus presented himself to the lost sheep of the house of Israel as their Prince and Savior, and as such they would not accept him. "He came to his own, and his own received him not." He is now presenting himself to lost sinners in the same character, and as such many do not receive him. Do not such as wickedly reject Christ as the Jews? If so, why do they lament the condition of fallen Israel, and remain unconscious of their own sin, and unalarmed at their own condition? The only reason we can assign is, that through the influence of the Prince of darkness, (the grand deceiver of mankind,) their eyes are kept closed to their own case, whilst they are permitted to see clearly the nature and extent of the sins of others, for which they are in no wise accountable. Could the rejecter of Christ suitably see and feel the nature and consequences of his own sin, conscience smitten, he would soon cry out, "God be merciful to me a sinner!"

To reject Christ is a most ungrateful, Heaven-provoking, God-defying, and soul-killing sin.

IT IS A MOST UNGRATEFUL SIN.—The gift of Jesus Christ is the richest blessing ever conferred on undeserving, wretched, helpless man. When man had fallen from a state of favor with God, and lay exposed to interminable ruin, God with his own free will, in boundless compassion sought for a remedy, and laying help on one that was mighty to save sends forth his Son into the world, who comes bringing salvation to the lost, and hope to the despairing sons of an apostate race. To accomplish this object he waded through exquisite sufferings, and at last yielded up his life upon the cross a sacrifice for sin. Having thus purchased redemption through his blood, and become the author of eternal salvation to all who believe, he comes to the miserable, dying sons of men in great compassion, and offers them mercy and forgiveness freely, without money and without price; and many, instead of receiving him with gladness, with an air of indifference close their hearts against him, and he stands without a rejected benefactor. Where was there ever ingratitude like this? So base, so unbecoming the creatures of God?—first to revolt from him, and then refuse to be pardoned by him.

IT IS A HEAVEN-PROVOKING SIN.—For a holy, merciful God of boundless wisdom and goodness to have his counsels slighted—his laws contemned, and then his overtures of mercy rejected, would be treating with unparalleled indignity the majesty of heaven. This high affront is committed by thousands who do not consider their ways, and are careless to secure their eternal interest.

IT IS A GOD-DEFYING SIN.—For a subject to rebel against his Sovereign, and then to reject the proffers of pardon from the throne, would not only be treating his sovereign with great indignity, but it would be challenging his power to punish. And what does the rejecter of Christ do less?—These are startling truths—truths of which the thoughtless sinner may not be conscious now, but cannot always remain so.

IT IS A SOUL-KILLING SIN.—To continue to reject Christ is to ruin the soul forever, as it places it beyond the reach of all help. Christ alone can rescue it from interminable ruin. To reject Christ is to close the only door of hope, and resign the soul over to eternal death. Who are willing to do this? And when hope has fled forever to take up with the bitter lamention, "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved."

You who reject Jesus Christ if unwilling thus to be deprived of all hope, and all happiness, "kiss the Son whilst thou art in the way with him, lest he be angry with thee and thou perish from the way."

Reject CHRIST?—The adorable Savior? The immaculate Son of God? For what? Is he not worthy of your affections? Is he not your friend? Is it not Christ, and Christ alone that can make you happy?

Reject him? No, never, unless you would affront the God who made you, and seal your final doom.

LIFE A VAPOR.

There is probably nothing with which human life will better compare than that of a Vapor. Because,

1. It is continually changing and varying in its appearance, shape and size.—Now it extends itself, and now it dwindles almost to a point. Again it expands, and again dwindles, and thus continues to alternate until it disappears. So it is with Human Life. It is constantly varying, and no certain calculation can be placed upon it. One day we are in health and flushed with hope—the next stretched upon a bed of pain, or by some cause thrown into disappointment and despondency. For a while we float in affluence, possessing riches and honors; anon we are reduced to poverty—neglected and shunned. So we are alternately tossed about like a bubble upon the waves of the sea, until it breaks and disappears.

2. It is uncertain in its continuance.—We gaze upon it for a while, observing its evolutions, when it unexpectedly vanishes from our sight. Thus it is with Life. We know not the hour of our departure. We look upon each other for a while, and then suddenly vanish from the earth. Like the vapor at its greatest magnitude, we, while flushed with health and flattering prospects, may be instantaneously and unexpectedly summoned away from the earth. Or, like the vapor, reduced to its most narrow limits, so we may be reduced by disease until but a little of life remains, and while we are looking with anxious solicitude for the tokens of returning health, the vital spark suddenly disappears, and all is over.

3. It is of short continuance. We look upon it but for a moment, and it is gone.—So Life, like a vapor, appeareth but for a little time and then vanisheth away. Man is of but few days and full of trouble. His days pass of as a dream that is told. He has but a transient existence here, and soon passes off to his long home.

4. When it once disappears it is irrecoverably gone. All the art and ingenuity of man cannot restore it. So it is with Life. When the vital spark has fled, it has fled forever. "If a man dies shall he live again?" All his associations with the world are broken off forever, for he has gone to that bourne from which no traveler returns. His body now sleeps where it must remain until the resurrection morn shall dawn upon the grave, when by the trump of God it will be aroused from its slumbers and reanimated to live eternally.

Such a representation of Human Life should serve to wean our affections from earth, and lead us to seek for the more enduring blessing presented to us in the word of Life.

For the Register.

Answer to I. O. U.

MESSRS. EDITORS—I noticed in the 10th No. of the Register an "Enquiry" with regard to the propriety of the solution of the question which appeared in one of your previous numbers. The remarks of the writer appear candid, and a respectful answer seems to be due him. He says:—"First, I should rather question the hypothesis." The gentleman does not question the correctness of the solution providing the hypothesis is true. On reviewing the solution I find a mistake which, after correcting, I will endeavor to explain the hypothesis.

The error is as follows: After finding the diameter of hollow globe from the supposition that the no. of solid miles formed the surface, I subtracted 2 from said diameter to give the diameter of the interior, or hollow, whereas, 1 only should have been subtracted. This arose from carelessness, for indeed I supposed, until reviewing the solution, that only one mile was allowed.

The reasons of the hypothesis are as follows:

1. Having reduced the earth to solid miles, these can be formed into as many smaller blocks of one mile long as is necessary for the mechanical construction of the hollow globe.

2. It is next obvious that the exterior surface will contain a greater no. of sq. miles than the interior, and in order that all the matter shall enter into the solid rim, these blocks must be made contiguous at the middle point between their exterior and interior surfaces.

3. The middle of the rim contains as many sq. miles as whole rim does solid miles. Hence there is no impropriety in assuming the no. of sol. mi. for surface if we allow 1 mile in the diameter of the hollow globe. G. M. L.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

From the New York Spectator.

ARRIVAL OF THE BRITISH QUEEN

13 DAYS AND 11 HOURS PASSAGE.

We have the pleasure to announce the arrival of the packet steam ship British Queen, Captain Roberts, from London, via Portsmouth. Capt. R. reports his passage to have been performed in 13 days and 11 hours from the time he discharged his pilot until he took one off the Hook.

By the Queen we have a large supply of English and French papers, which with our correspondents letters furnish the latest intelligence from all parts of Europe. Our London dates are May 1, Paris, evening of the 28th of April. Liverpool the 30th.—We are also indebted to our friends Messrs. Wadsworth and Smith for a file of late English papers.

Our readers are doubtless aware that the Chinese difficulties have arisen in part from the killing of a native by some English sailors, and the refusal of Capt. Elliot to surrender the culprits for trial by the Chinese authorities. He thought it best to take the matter into his own hands, and therefore, after a trial of some sort, sentenced five of the sailors to a certain period of imprisonment in England. They arrived, about the end of April, and were almost immediately set at liberty, the law officers of the Crown being of opinion that Capt. Elliot had no authority to sentence them as he had done.

Benjamin West's picture of the Annunciation, painted for the church of St. Marylebone, was sold on the 29th of April, by order of the vestry, at auction, for ten guineas! It was painted in 1817, and the artist was paid for it £800.

On the 24th of March the great Hebrew printing office at Wilna was destroyed by fire—loss estimated at 200,000 silver rubles.

The London Chronicle (ministerial) states that some time in March instructions were sent out to the Governor General of Canada and the British minister at Washington, to arrange the incidental question, respecting the extent and occupation of the disputed territory, which was the subject of the last published correspondence between the latter and Mr. Forsyth. This correspondence attracted much attention in London, and was vehemently discussed in the newspapers—of course with a great deal of party feeling, each party endeavoring to throw the blame of the boundary difficulty upon the other. We infer from the tone of the discussion, and from other circumstances, that an effort in earnest will immediately be made by the British Government to bring the matter to a definite conclusion.

A meeting was held in London, April 24, to protest against the "opium war"—Earl Stanhope in the chair. Strong resolutions were adopted, and a petition to Parliament, which was to be presented in the House of Lords by Earl Stanhope, and in the Commons by Lord Sandon. It was resolved also that the resolutions should be translated into Chinese and sent to the Emperor of China.

The great Anti-Slavery Conference is to commence its sittings in London on the 12th of June. The venerable Thomas Clarkson has declared his intention to be present, if he is alive at the time.

The Post-office stamps were to come into use on the 6th instant.

Intelligence had been received of the death of Sir Henry Fane, recently commander-in-chief of the British forces in India. He died on board the Malabar, on the 24th of March.

THE TWO SICILIES.

The following extracts contain all the intelligence we can find respecting the quarrel with England about the sulphur.

The Censeur de Lyons of the 26th publishes the following private letter from Rome of the 14th:—

"An English steam vessel has returned to Naples from Malta, in order to receive from Mr. Temple the King's definite reply to the letter of Great Britain. Ferdinand being aware of this betook himself with all speed to Castellamare, so that the English envoy found no person to whom he could address himself when he arrived at the Palace, and the vessel had consequently to leave, without bringing the Admiral who commands the British force at Naples, the answer which he expected in order to act upon it.

"The coasts are in a state of defence, and preparations are being made for a serious contest.

"The first hostile act on the part of England will probably be the capture of Neapolitan vessels; and just at this moment the two most powerful ships of the royal navy are at sea."

The Neapolitan navy is composed of 12 vessels of war, among which are the Vesuvio, 82 guns; the frigate Parthenope, 60; Isabella, 48; and the Urania, 46.

A letter from Naples states that the government is placing all the coast in a state of defence, and that every disbanded soldier has been recalled. The English Ambassador had invited all the English families residing at Naples not to renew the term for their apartments. Several of those families had already arrived there.

From the London Times, April 29.

The British ships of war, in th
borhood of Naples, commen reprisals, and captured (it was said,) 30 vessels. The Hydra was cruising off the mouth of the gulf. The Neapolitan vessels at Malta were under an embargo.

From the Morning Post, April 29.

The news from Naples is important. A circular of the French consul at Naples, dated the 18th, announces the beginning of only the following paragraph relating to India, in the Standard (evening) of April 30.

The Eco de l'Orient contains advices from Bombay, to the 29th of February. The Govenor General was at Allahabab. It is rumored that some important changes are to be made in the government of the East Indies. The seat of government is to be transfered from Calcutta to Bombay, the presidencies abolished, and the whole of the British possessions in the East Indies divided into northern and southern India.

RUSSIA.

A letter from Oddessa brings intelligence of another victory gained by the Circassians over their oppressors. They have taken a Russian fort with a battery of twenty guns. The Russians, on the other hand, are on the eve of invading Circassia with another army, and it is supposed that 40,000 men now at Sebastopol are destined for that purpose.

Thirty-three priests of the Romish united Greek church have been exiled from Russia for having signed an act of signifying their adhesion to the church of Rome.

From the Journal of Commerce.

NEWS BY THE BRITISH QUEEN—SETTLEMENT OF THE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

The late hour at which the papers by the British Queen were received rendered it impossible to give a full account of the news in our morning edition. In examining them further, it is with heartfelt satisfaction we find that the delicate and the difficult question of our North-eastern Boundary, is, in all probability, adjusted. It appears that the award of the King of the Netherlands which made the river St. John's the boundary between the two countries is to be the basis of the new arrangement, and that as an indemnity to Maine for any supposed rights she may possess to land north of the St. John's the British Government is to pay her £200,000, or about half a million of dollars. Most sincerely do we rejoice in this compromise,—not so much because it is, or is not, a good bargain in itself, as because it removes a bone of contention which has long existed, and the right to which each party has claimed with so much confidence, that it is impossible to say when or how the affair could be amicably adjusted. It would ill become us to object to the arrangement said to have been agreed on, since a reference to our files will show that it is exactly the arrangement that we recommended, save that we did not specify the amount which England ought to pay to Maine by way of compromising her claims to the lands relinquished.

Accident and Death.—We regret to learn that a melancholy accident happened yesterday afternoon on the Delaware. A new and large sail-boat called "The Spray," which had been launched in the earlier part of the afternoon, upset opposite Callowhill street, soon after leaving Maiden street wharf. The number on board, including a band of music is variously estimated at from fifty to seventy-five, and the crowd being so great, it is impossible to ascertain who were among the missing. Several persons were seen to sink, and their absence will be the only means that will lead to the discovery of their names. The mast of the Spray is 65 feet in length, and she carries 652 feet of canvass.—Pennsylvanian.

We learn from a source to be relied on, that some months ago nine travelling preachers, and in the neighborhood of 600 members, have left the Methodist Episcopal Church within the bounds of the Erie Conference, which lies on the borders of the north-east corner of the State of Ohio, on account of oppressive measures of the government of that church. They, at present, sustain a temporary relation to the Congregational Church, awaiting the doings of the present General Conference.—Western Reserve Cabinet.

John Keill of Tennessee recently died, willing 30 blacks their freedom, and left them from $4000 to $5000 to go and begin with.

Peter West of Virginia has recently willed freedom to a family of thirteen slaves, who are now in Ohio.

Horrid Tragedy.—A gentleman from Whitesville, Harris county, has given us the following particulars of a most appaling incident: Mr. Thomas Saddler, a citizen of that place, had occasion some days since to chastise a child belonging to one of his negro men. On Saturday last Mr. S. found it necessary to inflict punishment on another child of the same family. The father in a sudden fit of rage, seized upon an axe and severed the head of the first child from its body—with a second blow he cleft the body of the other child, and then turning upon Mr. Saddler, he instantly split his skull and caused his almost immediate death. The negro was taken, but in attempting to make his escape, was wounded with a ball from a pistol of one of the party engaged in the arrest. On Saturday evening last he was lodged in the Hamilton jail and it was presumed that he would so far recover from his wounds as to render him liable to the penalties of the law.—Columbus (Geo.) Enq.

All but a Rogue.—A man at Portland, says the Boston Transcript, who was paid a fortnight since, in an exchange of money at the Canal Bank, $150 more than he was entitled to receive, sent the Cashier the following note:

"J. B. Scott—Sir: I send $350 of the money that was paid at your Bank through mistake. I should send the other hundred, but I have spent it. Yours, &c.

One that tried to be a rogue, but Conscience would not let him."

Tallahassee, May 2.—We were last Wednesday presented with a fine parcel of green corn and cucumbers, from the garden of our enterprising townsman Dr. Coleman. This is very early for these vegetables even in this country, while at the North the seed is scarcely planted. The Dr. will accept our thanks for the present.—Floridian.

Sentence of Death.—Lorenzo Dow, alias Pablo, was yesterday brought before the U. S. Circuit Court to receive his sentence, having been convicted (in two trials) of the murder of Capt. Wm. B. Langdon, of the brig Francis, of Boston. The sentence was delivered by Chief Justice Taney, and was that of death. The prisoner is to be hung upon the walls of the jail, but the appointed day we did not learn; he is a Malay, and his appearance is very unintellectual and insane.—Balt. Amer.

Re-appearance of Mr. May.—Mr. May, the merchant of Illinois, whose disappearance from Philadelphia, caused some considerable excitement in that city, has returned to his friends, having been the meanwhile in Canada, whither he had gone in pursuit of a person who robbed him shortly after his arrival in this city. He succeeded in getting possession of his money and securing the robber.

Awful Storm.—On Saturday, the 9th instant about noon a most frightful storm visited this place and the surrounding country. The hail came down at first in small bodies, and rapidly increasing in size, until it fell in masses almost as large as a man's fist. The largest one we saw measured was nine inches and a half in circumference, but we heard of one which was picked up nearly twice as large. It destroyed the greater part of the growing crops and gardens within its range, pelted down nearly all the fruit, and broke, perhaps, from 20,000 to 30,000 panes of glass in this town alone. Pigeons flying in the air were knocked down dead, poultry were killed, the ground is covered with fallen vegetation and the leaves and branches of trees. We have heard of no person being lost.—Fayetteville (N. C.) Observer.

William M. Price Arrested.—William M. Price, late U. S. District Attorney, who has recently returned to this country from France, was yesterday arrested at the suit of the United States, by the district marshall. After some hours detention he was liberated on bail to the amount of $82,000, which he readily procured.—Courier.

Voluntary Surrender of Newcombe, late Teller of the Manhattan Bank.—Colin G. Newcombe, who recently absconded from the Manhattan Bank, and against whom an indictment for embezzlement was found by the grand jury, at their March term, has followed the example of Dabney, and given himself up to the ministers of justice—with two gentlemen as sureties, he yesterday proceeded to the Police Office, and voluntarily surrendering himself, gave bail in $10,000 and was discharged. The Recorder, who had examined the two sureties touching their ability to become bail, and being fully satisfied, addressed a note to the police magistrate on the subject.—Journal of Commerce.

From the Norfolk Beacon.

Return of Dabney.—Dabney has returned, and will be produced as a witness on the pending trial of Green. It is said that when Dabney reached Taylorsville, on his flight from Richmond, the car had departed, and he remained on the spot all next day. On his arrival at Fredericksburg, he took the route to Frederic, and thence continued his onward route to Canada. On his arrival at Toronto, in Upper Canada, he recognized several negroes whom he had known in Virginia. This induce him to look out for other quarters. Driven almost to desperation, he hesitated whether he should put an end to his life or surrender himself to the authorities at Richmond.—In this state of mind he determined to write to a gentleman in Richmond to come on and see him, and the result is, that he returned to take his chance.

We learn that the universal impression in Richmond is that he did not take a dollar from the Bank. He is at large, and was at the Bank of Virginia before the directors on Tuesday from nine till four.—The utmost secrecy is observed respecting his disclosures or testimony, as it is impossible to tell who may be criminated before the investigation is closed.

There may be many reasons why he should be allowed to go at large, but the principle one no doubt is that his evidence is wanted for important purposes. Indeed there is a hint of the sort in the following paragraph respecting Green's trial from the Compiler of yestetday.

Upon the opening of the examining court yesterday to proceed with the above trial, Joseph Mayo, Esq. prosecuting attorney, intimated that Wm. B. Dabney would be introduced as a witness in behalf of the prosecution. The counsel for the defence asked time to consider the question as to competency to give evidence in the case. The court assented and thereupon adjourned. This question will, we suppose, be argued to day.

Arrest of Levis.—The following extract from a Paris letter in the Courier of this morning gives the particulars of the arrest of the absconded cashier.

You are aware, I suppose, that Levis, the absconding cashier of the Schuylkill bank at Philadelphia, arrived in France, (Bordeaux, I believe,) some weeks since. He proceeded at once to Paris, and has been residing in a comparatively humble and unostentatious way in Rue Feydeau, near the Bourse. Quiet as he kept himself, however, his arrival became known to your minister General Cass, who, although not applied to on the subject, deemed it his duty, from the enormous amount of the defalcation of Levis, to take such steps as promised to lead to the recovery of the plundered property. To the application of General Cass, the French authorities said, we will go into the international question, touching the right to arrest and hand over a dishonest or offending refugee, but fortunately for the aids of justice—in this case the offender brings himself under the operation of the French laws by—(a certain circumstance which I give you in private, but which I withhold least it serve future guilty persons.) "We shall therefore arrest him and then you may take your measures at leisure."

Levis was accordingly taken into custody. On his person were found 100 francs (20 dollars,) in French silver, and sixteen Spanish doubloons. A species of commission was appointed by General Cass to examine the prisoner, and endeavor to prevail on him to do his employers all the justice in his power. The commission consisted of the secretary of the embassy of the U. States; Mr. Brent, (the American consul,) and two or three American gentlemen of respectability, who for the moment resided here. I shall not trouble you with the details of the proceedings, but at once inform you that the measures taken by Gen. Cass have not been unsuccessful. Levis has acknowledged that there is American stock to the amount of 150,000 dollars, purchased by the money of which he robbed his employers, standing in the names of two persons, in trust for him, and is this day to execute a transfer of it.

FLORIDA—MORE MURDERS.

On the 23d ult., the wife of Mr John McLane and three children were most inhumanely butchered, about 17 miles from this place. The attack was made about sunrise. Mrs. McLane was at the cow-pen, with two or three of her children, and apprised of the approach of the enemy by the fright of the cows. She instantly retreated to the house, caught up a child, and directed her eldest daughter aged about twelve, to take up another, and then fled in the direction of the hammock. When within about ten yards of the hammock, they were all overtaken and killed with pine knots and knives. Mrs. McLane's throat was cut, and she was also stabbed.

The children were knocked in the head and the eldest girl scalped. A son of Mr. McLane (who was an invalid,) about 16 to 18 of age seized a rifle and followed the hapless victims; but being fired upon, returned to the house, shut the doors and prepared for defence. The cowardly wretches tried every expedient to fire the house; he, however, kept them off, and thinks he killed one, who, at the crack of his gun, dropped his torch, fell and crawled off on his hands and feet. After besieging the house nearly all day, burning the out houses, and trying every expedient to fire the dwelling, they ceased their efforts for a while, and retired to the hammock.

In the meantime the father returned home. He and his son fortunately made their escape, though pursued and fired upon by the enemy, and gave the alarm.

Men have been in pursuit of the enemy, for several days, but thus far without success. Their numbers are not accurately known, but supposed to be from 20 to 30.

Since writing the above, we have learned that this band came up from below, and their retreat being cut off between Tallahassee and St. Marks, they have doubtless tried to make their way back by some other route.

The Tornado at Natches.—This disastrous visitation from the sky has left a train of destruction behind it most lamentable and melancholy to think of. So destructive, so terrific, so appalling a disaster from the enraged wind has never been known before—cannot be found on record. Tornadoes and hurricanes have been known before, but they have generally occurred in regions untenanted by man, and we have only heard of the forest being prostrated and the earth ploughed up by the howling storm; but here is a city destroyed and hundreds of our fellow beings swept away into eternity. We give here a letter received yesterday from a friend in Natches. He gives a vivid picture of the desolate and unfortunate city.

Natches, Thursday, 5 P. M., May 7.

To the Editors of the Daily Picayune;—By the steamboat Meteor I hasten to acquaint you with one of the most horrid and destructive hurricanes that ever happened in the United States. While nearly the whole of our city were engaged in dining at the hour of two this afternoon, vivid flashed the lightning, loud roared the thunder, and black grew the sky. In a few minutes the tempest came, and for about forty minutes we were in that perilous state which speaks of only destruction and death. First toppled down the chimnies, then went the roofs of houses, and a moment after house after house fell into ruins. In the hurry of this letter I cannot begin to particularize the death and damage around me. "Natches under the hill" is entirely swept away, and the loveliest part of the South on the Bluff above, is wreck and ruin; and those yet living will find difficulty upon difficulty in getting shelter to-night. My heart sickens at the scenes before me. As I walked to the boat from which I write, the dead and wounded met me every twenty steps. Natches is ruined, ruined, ruined. Yours, truly.

In addition to the above we have gathered the following particulars. The steamboat St. Lawrance went down. It is said she was lifted many feet out of the water and instantly dashed to the bottom of the river with every soul on board. The enormous body of water now rolling in the Mississippi and swelling to the very topmost limits of its banks, was lashed into foaming billows, and flatboats were torn to pieces and their scattered planks flew about in the wind like feathers. The lady of Mr. Haliday, one of the proprietors of the Free Trader, was saved by a miracle, with her young child in her arms. Every church and every public building shared in the ruin. Steeples were dashed to the earth and houses all over town were unroofed.

The steamboat Prairie is now lying at our wharf torn to pieces—"blown up" by the wind worse than ever a boat was blown up by steam. The hull and machinery is all that is left of her. Her cabin was carried away, floor and all. The wheelhouses were unroofed, and what remains of the boat is rent and shattered in an awful manner. Among the sufferers on board the Prairie was Emanuel Blanc an estimable young man of this city, but Captain Freligh cannot estimate how many persons were lost from his boat. Himself and Mr. James Wilson, the clerk, narrowly escaped.

From an extra issued from the shattered office of the Free Trader, we learn that a public meeting has been held by the citizens in the court house, at which Col. James C. Wilkins presided and F. L. Claiborne, Esq. was secretary. Addresses were delivered by J. M. Hewett and J. M. Duffield, Esqs. and resolutions offered by the latter gentleman and others, appointing relief committees, &c.

The City Hotel, through the kindness of the proprietor, Noah Barlow, Esq. has been thrown open to the wounded. Dr. Pollard has taken the Tremont House for an additional Hospital, S. Duncan, Esq. having generously offered to be responsible for the rent.

From the ruins of the steamboat Hotel, Mr. Alexander, the landlord, his lady and barkeeper, were dug out alive, as also Timothy Flint the historian and Geographer, and his son from Natchitoches, La. besides Dr. Taliaferro and many others. Mrs. Alexander is considered dangerously injured, two of her children were killed in her arms.—As many as nine dead bodies have been dug from the steamboat Hotel.

The number of burials which took place on the 8th inst. was about fifty, and many are still in a dangerous and dying condition.

From an estimate made by Mr. Ruffner and S. J. Boyd, Esq. the total loss is supposed to be about $1,200,000.

The neighboring planters are generously sending in large gangs of slaves to assist in cleaning the streets and digging the dead from the ruins.

The greatest loss of life was among the flat boats, which were swamped and destroyed before the unfortunate men could escape to the shore. One paper states that upwards of 200 were lost. A boy is said to have been taken up in the air and lodged in a tree a half a mile from his father's house.

The citizens of Concordia and Madison have held a public meeting and adopted measures for the relief of their friends in Natchez. This awful calamity has created a sensation here in New Orleans that will not soon be forgotten.

RELIGIOUS ANNIVERSARIES OF THE WEEK.

American Seamen's Friend Society.—Twelfth Anniversary celebrated on Monday evening. The operations of the Society have been retarded during the past year by the financial embarrassments of the country; but the Board have gone to the full extent of the benefactors of the community, and much good has in fact been accomplished. Addresses were made by Capt. Ladd, of Minot, Me.; and the Rev. Mr. Brainard, of Philadelphia; and Rev. E. N. Sawtell, Chaplain of the Society to seamen at Havre. A collection was taken up in behalf of the Society's funds.

New-York Sunday School Union.—Anniversary celebrated on Tuesday, by the gathering of the schools for appropriate exercises in the afternoon, and by a public meeting for the reading of the report, and the customary speaking at the Tabernacle, in the evening. The number of children in the several processions was immense, and greater than on any former occasion.—The number of Schools in this city is 94; connected with which, there are 2,390 teachers. The number of pupils is 18,076, viz: white boys 8,454; colored boys and adults, 519; white girls, 7,909; colored girls and adults 1,191.

American Education Society,—The number of individuals aided by the Society during the last year, is 267 persons in 18 theological seminaries; 487 in 18 colleges; and 160 in 57 academies—total 914. Of these, 540 were assisted in institutions in the New England States, and 360 in the Middle, Southern and Western states. The number of new beneficiaries received during the year, 127. The Society has aided since its commencement 3260 persons. The whole receipts for the year, of the Parent Society and its branches, amount to $51,307 60, and the expenditures for the same time have been $58,636 67, exceeding the receipts by $7,329 07. The earnings of the beneficiaries have been much as usual, evincing a commendable zeal in making efforts to sustain themselves as far as practicable. The sum earned, as reported, is $31,971; the whole amount the last 13 years, is $309,203. The sum refunded by beneficiaries the last year is $3,785 81, which added to what had been refunded in previous years, makes the total amount $39,103.

American Tract Society.—Meeting Wednesday evening, S. V. S. Wilder in the Chair. Total receipts during the year $117,598 16, of which $41,475 49 were donations, including $19,597 53 for foreign distribution, and $3,264 50 for volume enterprise. The receipts are $14,699 24 less than during the previous, while the amount received for sales is $893 71 more. There have been printed during the year, 325,000 volumes; 3,408,500 publications; 117,970 pages—making since the organization of the society, 1,125,644,705 pages. Total circulated during the year, 6,346 sets of the Evangelical Family Library; total volumes 291,420; publications 4,219,821; pages 223,687,707; making the entire circulation since the formation of the society, 18,043 libraries; 1,444,810 volumes; 55,259,399 publications; 1,051,674,176 pages. Six hundred and seventy-five distinct grants have been made, amounting to 11,489,391 pages, including more than 2,000,000 pages for foreign lands; and 4,480,955 pages have been delivered to life members and directors—amounting in all to $10,648 96.

Colonization Society.—Meeting Wednesday evening, Rev. Dr. De Witt, in the Chair. Treasurer's report presented an empty Treasury. The meeting was eloquently addressed by Rev. Dr. Bethune, Rev. Mr. Cone, Dr. Miller of Princeton, and several other gentlemen.

American Anti-Slavery Society.—The meetings of this Institution have been continued every day during the week, and, we believe, have resulted in its division into two distinct associations. A section of the old society, headed by William Loyd Garrison, blend with the creed which relates to the legitimate purpose of the Association, a diversity of opinions on the rights of woman, and various questions of morality. On Thursday an attempt was made to elect a woman named Abby Kelly, to the Vice Presidency, with several gentlemen; three of whom declined the partnership; and the demurrers, who constituted a minority of the meeting, have since organized a distinct association, as the true "American Anti-Slavery Society." From the abstract of the Treasurer's Report, it appears that the receipts of the Society amounted to $47,929, being $280 more than last year. The number of publications issued was 517,151, of which 16,183 were bound volumes. Its affairs so far as they are unconnected with internal dissensions, seems to be in a prosperous condition.

The best farmers are those who combine the most intelligence with the most practical industry, sound economy and taste.

CLEAR THE WAY!

I am here Myself among the Rest.

THE subscriber still keeps 'digging' away at Bureaus, Tables, Stands, and Bedsteads, and sometimes makes other work that folks want, but he don't think it best to go into a bill of particulars. Suffice it to say, that there will be kept on hand, or made to order, all kinds of Cabinet Ware in his line of business. Having been to some expense in obtaining experienced workmen, (that folks do say can't be beat in getting up things nice,) he would invite those wishing to purchase articles cheap, durable and handsome, to "just drop in" the Ware Room ☞one door east of the Stone Store, and directly opposite the Post Office.

☞Most kinds of Lumber and Produce received in exchange for Furniture, and CASH not refused.

THE CROSS BEFORE THE CROWN.

"Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."—Numbers xxiii. 10.

Oh, let me die the Christian's death,
Of triumph and of peace,
Like him, when fainter grows my breath,
Ere it forever cease—
Like him, may I possess the power,
To meet unshrinkingly that hour;
And bid the world farewell,
Without a pang, without a fear,
Without a wish to linger here—
Assured that "all is well!"
Eager to soar from earth away,
A soul from bondage free—
To the bright realms of endless day,
And pure felicity.
Methinks I hear a still small voice,
Responsive to my prayer;
Approving well my uttered choice,
The Christian's end to share;
And thus to me it kindly saith—
"If thou would'st die the Christians death.
And gain his blest reward;
Renounce this world of sin and strife,
And live the Christian's holy life,
Obedient to his Lord;
Seek but His smile—fear but His frown,
'Tis meet if thou wilt wear the crown,
That thou shouldst bear the cross."

MISCELLANEOUS.

From the Athenium and Visitor.

CRUELTY AND CHARITY.

In so large a family as that of Mr. T—— there was a good deal of sewing to do, and out of charity the work was taken from a seamstress who had sewed for the family sometime, and given to a poor widow woman with several small children. Ostensibly only was this charity. Really, it was to save a few more pennies. How could this be? some one will ask. Let me sketch a little scene; premising that this poor woman's husband was just dead, and she left, helpless and friendless, with no apparent means of support. Besides she was in very feeble health. By accident Mr. T—— had heard of her distressed situation, and at the suggestion of the individual who named her case to him, told his wife that he thought it would be a charity to give her some sewing.

'I think it would indeed,' says Mrs. T—

'Our sewing costs us a great deal,' responds the careful husband, 'and in this thing we may benefit ourselves, as well as do a deed of charity. No doubt this woman is rather an indifferent sewer, in comparison with Miss R——, and therefore her work will not of course be worth so much. And she will no doubt think half the price Miss R—— gets, a good one.'

'No doubt,' chimes in the frugal partner.

Mrs. —— was sent for. After she was seated the following conversation ensues.

'Can you do plain sewing?'

'Yes, ma'am, as well as most persons.'

'What is your price for fine shirts?'

'I havn't set any price yet, but I will work as low as any one.'

'But you know that to get work you will have to do it a little lower than ordinary.—People don't like to change."

'Well ma'am, I am in want, and I will work at almost any price for my children.'

'I suppose you will make fine shirts for a quarter?'

'Yes ma'am!'

'And calico dresses for the same?'

'Yes ma'am.'

'Well, that's reasonable. Boys' common shirts you will not charge over eleven pence for?'

'No ma'am.'

'That's reasonable, and I'll do all I can for you. It gives me pleasure to help the poor. Come down to-morrow, and I'll have some work ready for you.' The widow departed.

'Well, wife,' says Mr. T——, bustling in when he saw the woman depart. 'At what price will she work?'

'At just half what Miss R—— charges.'

'Well, that's something like. It gives me pleasure to befriend any one who is willing to work at a reasonable price. Why this will save us almost a dollar a week the year round.'

'Yes, it will so; and if I keep her at it, or some one else, at the same price for a year, you'll let me have a fifty dollar shawl, won't you?'

'Yes, if you want it.'

'Well, I'll do my best. It's shameful what some of those seamstresses do charge.

It is often well to reverse a picture. Suppose we look at the other side of this.

Mrs. —— had always been delicate.—When a girl she could never sew long at a time without getting a pain in her side. She married a hard working, industrious mechanic, whose trade was not very lucrative, yielding barely enough for a support. Her health after her marriage was but little improved, and when with several small children she was left a widow, she yielded in her first keen anguish of bereavement to despair. But her mother cannot long sit in idleness when her dear babes are about her. She could think of no way of getting a living for them but by her needle, and as she was a neat sewer, she hoped to get work, and earn food and scant clothing at least.—But she could get no work. No person knew her who wanted sewing done. She applied to several, and was still without the means of earning a dollar when the last one was spent. Just at this sad moment, the fact of her destitution becoming more known, Mrs. T—— sent for her.

As she carried home her work the day after the interview, she was glad at heart with the thought that now there was a way of escape at least from starvation. But little more her yearning heart could promise her. Boys shirts at twelve and a half cents were her first pieces of work. Two of these by hard work she managed to get done in a day. Had they been made plain, she could have finished them early, and had time to give many necessary attentions to her children. But the last words of Mrs. T—— had robbed her of that chance. 'You can stitch the collars of these, any how—you can afford it, I suppose, and they iron better when that is done.' The simple and touching—'Yes ma'am,' but in a sadder tone than usual, was the only response.

Next morning, she was up early, though her head ached badly, and she was faint and weak, from having sat so steadily thro' the whole of the preceding day. Her children were all taken up, washed and dressed; her rooms cleaned, and a scanty meal of mush and milk prepared for the little ones, and a cup of tea for herself. Her own stomach refused the food of which her children partook with keen appetites, and she could only swallow a few mouthfuls of dry stale bread.

It was near ten o'clock when she got fairly down to work, her head still aching and almost binding her. Some how or other she could not get on at all fast, and it was long past the usual dinner hour before she had finished the first garment. The children were impatient for their dinner, and she had to make great haste in preparing it, as well for their satisfaction, as to gain time.

'Mother we are getting tired of mush and milk,' said one of the little ones. 'You don't have all the good things now you used to. No pies, nor puddings, nor meat.'

'Never mind, dear, we'll have some nice corn cakes for supper.'

'You'll have supper soon, won't you, mother?' said another little one coaxingly, her thoughts busy with the nice corn cakes.

'And shan't we have molasses on them,' said another, pushing away her bowl of mush and milk.

'No, dear, not to-night, but to-morrow, we'll have some.'

'Why not to-night, mother, I want some to-night.'

'Mother aint got any money to buy it with to-night, but to-morrow she will have some,' said the mother soothingly.

'O we'll have 'lasses to-morrow for our cakes,' cried a little girl who could just speak, clapping her hands in great glee.

After dinner, Mrs. —— worked hard, and in much bodily pain and misery, to finish the other shirt in which the last stitch was taken, at nine o'clock at night.

Soon after breakfast next, she took the four shirts home to Mrs. T——, her thoughts most occupied with the comfortable food she was to buy her children, with the half dollar she had earned. For it was a sad truth that she had laid out her last half dollar for the meal with which she was making mush for her little ones.

After examining every seam, every hem, and every line of stitching, Mrs. T—— expressed approbation of the work; and handed the poor woman a couple of fine shirts to make for Mr. T—— and a calico dress for herself. She did not offer to pay her for the work she had done; after lingering a few moments, Mrs. —— ventured to hint that she would like to have a part of what she had earned.

'Oh dear! I never pay seamstresses until their bills amount to five dollars. It is so troublesome to keep account of small sums. When you have made five dollars I will pay you.'

Mrs. R—— retired, but with a heart that seemed like lead in her bosom. 'When shall I earn five dollars? not for a whole month at this rate,' were the words that formed themselves in her thoughts.

'We shall have the molasses now, mother, shan't we,' said two or three glad little voices, as she entered her home.

For a few minutes she knew not what answer to make. Then gathering them all about her, she explained to them, as well as she could make them understand, that the lady for whom she had done the work did not pay her, and she was afraid it would be a good while before she would; and that until she was paid she could not get them any thing better than what they had.

The little things all stole silently and without a murmur away, and the mother again sat down to her work. A tear would often gather in her eye, as she looked up from the bright needle glistening in her fingers, and noticed the sadness and disappointment pictured in their young faces.—From this style of gloomy feeling she was roused by a knock at the door, and a pleasant looking young lady somewhat gaily dressed, came in with a small bundle in her hand.

She introduced herself by saying that she had just seen some pretty shirts at Mr. T.'s, and that she was so well pleased with the work, that she had inquired for the maker. 'And now having found you,' said she 'I want you to make and fit this calico dress for me if you do such work.'

'I shall be glad to do it for you,' said she encouraged by the kind and feeling manner of the lady.

'And what will you charge?'

Mrs. —— hesitated a moment and then said. 'Mrs. T—— gives me a quarter of a dollar.'

There was a bright spot for a moment on the cheek of the lady. 'Then I will give you three,' said she with warmth.

Mrs. —— burst into tears, and she could not help it.

'Are you in need?' inquired the strange lady hesitatingly, but with an air of feeling that could not be mistaken.

For a moment the widow paused, but the sight of her children conquered the rising emotion of her pride.

'I have nothing but a little corn meal in the house, and have no money.'

A tear glistened in the stranger's eye—her breast heaved with strong emotion.—Then again all was still.

'I will pay you for this dress beforehand, then; and I want it done very nice, and I will pay you a dollar for making it. Can I have it by day after to-morrow?'

'Certainly ma'am, to-morrow evening, if you want it.'

The dollar was paid down, and the angel of mercy departed. More than one heart was made glad that morning.

EDUCATION.

"We utterly repudiate, as unworthy, not of freemen only, but of men, the narrow notion, that there is to be an education for the poor as such. Has God provided for the poor a coarser earth, a thinner air, a paler sky? Does not the glorious sun pour down his golden flood as cheerily upon the poor man's hovel as upon the rich man's palace? Have not the cottager's children as keen a sense of all the freshness, verdure, fragrance, melody, and beauty of luxuriant nature, as the pale sons of kings? Or is it in the mind that God has stamped the imprint of a baser birth, so that the poor man's child knows with an inborn certainty, that his lot is to crawl, not to climb?

It is not so. God has not done it. Man cannot do it. Mind is immortal. Mind is imperial. It bears no mark of high or low, of rich or poor; it heeds no bounds of time, or place or rank, or circumstances; it asks but freedom; it requires but light. It is heaven-born and aspires to heaven.—Weakness does not enfeeble it. Poverty cannot repress it. Difficulties do but stimulate its vigor.

And the poor tallow chandler's son who sits up all the night to read the book which an apprentice lends him, lest the master's eye should miss it in the morning, shall stand and treat with kings—shall bind the lightning with an hempen cord, and bring it harmless from the skies.

The Common School is common, not as inferior, nor as the school for the poor man's children, but as the light and air is common.

It ought to be the best school, because it is the first; and in all ground works the beginning is one half. Who does not know the value to a community of a plentiful supply of the pure element of water? And infinitely more than this is the Common School; for it is the foundation at which the mind drinks, and is refreshened and strengthened in its career of usefulness and glory.—Address of the Education Society of New Jersey.

FOR THE MERCHANT.

The Influence of Merchants on the Character of a Country.—A lecturer in Philadelphia thus speaks on the influence of mercantile men in the formation of a national character:—"They stand especially on the margin of the ocean, and reaching out their hands to distant regions, form the chief connecting link with other nations and people; so that by their weight, their numbers, and the wealth they manage, they powerfully influence society at home, they in a great measure stamp the impression of its character abroad. Are they just, faithful, true to their engagements, obedient to the principles of sound morality, prudent, industrious—in a word, wise in true wisdom, which teaches to seek lawful and honorable means, and to spurn all others, however tempting; are they such, they give a good name to their country and to their city, and impart the fragrance of their well-earned reputation to all around them. The very air perfumed by their virtue. Should they, unhappily, be the reverse of all this—faithless, heedless, rash, eager in the pursuit of gain, and regardless of the methods of reaching it, they dishonor and disgrace their neighborhood, and shed upon it the odium of their own misconduct. Nor will such conduct fail to poison and corrupt the community they live in. Dishonesty and trick in the commercial class, must lead to dishonesty and trick, in those who deal with them. If the seller employ stratagem and art to deceive the buyer, the buyer will resort to stratagem and art in self-defence, until at length the point will be, who can most successfully deceive and cheat his neighbor."

FOR THE FARMER.

From the American Farmer's Companion.

CULTIVATION OF CORN.

Sir:—As the time has arrived in many parts of our country for planting corn, and is fast approaching in many others, I send you a successful method of cultivating that most valuable crop, for insertion in your useful paper. First, I plough the ground well in the fall, early in the spring I put on a good quantity of well rotted manure, and from thirty to fifty bushels of lime to an acre, then I harrow the ground until it is completely pulverized; then the furrows are drawn four feet apart, and in the next place I select the largest and soundest ears for seed, and shell the small and ill-shaped grains from each end of the ear as refuse, and the other I shell and put to soak in a strong liquid of well rotted manure for about twelve hours before planting; this method not only assists the seed in germinating, but produces a more strong and vigorous shoot than it would in any other way; when my seed is ready, I drop four grains in each hill, three feet apart in the furrows, drawn four feet apart as before mentioned; I then cover the grains one and a half inches deep, and press the earth with the foot or hoe, which I have also noticed in my experience to be an advantage in assisting the seed to germinate; after the corn is up, apply a small quantity of leached ashes or plaster to each hill, and after the corn is of a suitable size I commence cultivating. I use the cultivator instead of plough, my reason for not using the plough in cultivating, is, because it cuts the roots and causes them to bleed and thereby depriving the plants of a portion of their nourishment. Another reason is, that considerable labor is saved by using the cultivator, for corn wants nothing more than to keep the ground loose and well stirred, and to be kept clear of weeds. In the fall when the grain is glazed, I cut the whole at the ground and put it in shocks, so that I may derive some benefit from the stalks as food for my cattle, which I consider to be of more advantage than the few more bushels of corn that I might get by letting it stand until thoroughly ripe, by cutting the stalks and feeding them. I am more than doubly paid for cutting by the increase of manure, which ought to be an important item to every cultivator of the soil.

Great National Work!

LADIES COMPANION, (established in 1834,) a popular and highly esteemed MAGAZINE OF GENERAL LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS: embellished with Gorgeous and Costly Engravings on Steel, Copper and Wood, the Quarterly Fashions, and also with Fashionable and Popular Music, arranged for the Piano-Forte, Harp and Guitar.

TERMS—$3 a year. Single copies 25 cents.—Office 109 Fulton street, New York.

Mrs. L. H. Sigourney: The editors are happy to communicate the information to their readers, that arrangements have been effected with this talented lady by which she will still continue to be a regular and constant contributor to the 'Ladies Companion.' Her engagements in other quarters will not interfere with that connection with the 'Companion,' which secures to its readers the enjoyment of her beautiful productions.

Dr Oliver Wendell Holmes of Boston; Professor Longfellow of Cambridge College, and Mrs. Anna Maria Wells of Boston, will hereafter contribute to the 'Ladies Companion.'

SPLENDID NEW STEEL ENGRAVINGS by our best artists, accompany each number; illustrated by tales and spirited sketches, which will as heretofore, continue to be magnificent and far superior to those published in any cotemporary work in America.

QUARTERLY FASHIONS.

Plates of the prevailing Fashions appear once every three months, viz: December, March, June and September.

The Ladies Companion contains a larger quantity of reading than any other magazine issued in this country, and its subscription price is only three dollars a year. The great combination of talent secured for the coming year will render it unequalled by any other periodical.

THE MUSICAL DEPARTMENT.

This department of the Ladies Companion has ever commanded a large share of attention, and has been looked upon with no little interest by its readers, and more especially the Ladies, whom the publisher is in the highest degree anxious to please.—It will continue to be a subject of more than usual care to him, and to the Professor under whose supervision it is placed, to make that portion of the magazine allotted to Music, more than ever deserving of the countenance of every lover of music.—It has ever been and will continue to be the desire to have all pieces of Music printed correctly and free from errors.

Over every department an equally careful supervision will be strictly exercised by the Editors, and all appropriate expenditures will be liberally bestowed, as it is the design of the publisher, with the aid of his contributors and the advice of his friends to make the Ladies Companion distinguished for beauty and accuracy of its typography—the variety and high tone of its literary articles—and the unequalled splendor of its pictoral Embellishments, which are entirely new and engraved by A. Dick, expressly for the work.

It is the determination of the publisher to use every means to maintain the superiority which the Ladies Companion has obtained. For four years he has steadily pursued a course of improvement, and he flatters himself that his present facilities are such as to give the Ladies Companion eminent advantages over all other publications of its character.

From the foregoing it will be perceived that the Ladies Companion embraces every department within the range of Belles Letters and the Fine Arts: and no exertion or expense will be deemed too great to render the work equal to any other extant. The flattering and general testimonials of nearly every contemporary journal in the United States, and in fact many on the other side of the Atlantic, have strongly asserted the undeniable claims of the Ladies Companion to the support of the public generally. There is no work that gives its readers such a great return for their subscriptions.

TERMS.—$3 a year in advance, or $4 during the year. No subscription received for less than one year.

Complete sets of the volume from May, 1839, can be furnished at the subscription price by applying at the office. All letters must be addressed, post paid, to WILLIAM W. SNOWDEN, 109 Fulton street, N. Y.

Illustrations of Prophecy,

BY DAVID CAMPBELL.

No. 9, Washington Street, Boston.

THIS work of above 400 pages 18 mo. just published, embraces many of the views of distinguished writers on the prophecies of Daniel, and John, together with some of no small value, found in no other work. It is prepared as the reader will see, with unusual advantages of imparting to the eye the resemblance of the natural emblems used by the prophets. These will interest many of the young, especially to investigate the prophecies, which they have hitherto regarded as a sealed book; and with the geography of the prophecies, and chronological calculations peculiar to this work; it will afford much help to understand these parts of the Bible.—It also shows the erroneous ground of some modern propagators of an old but startling theory, that the 'end of all things is at hand.' Should the reader fail to find that fulness desirable, yet, from so brief a dissertation, he will find much to gratify and instruct. It is a work demanded by the present exigency of the public mind, and is written with a good spirit, giving sober common sense views on matters of great interest.

The work contains 150 pictoral illustrations colored according to the description of the prophets: price $1,00. An Appendix in form of an Atlas, is prepared to accompany the work, which gives a view of countries, in which predicated events have taken place, and which are to take place; also large diagrams and chronological tables, entirely original in their arrangements. One of these plates, throws the entire chronology of the apocalypse, upon one square, to page with the seals, trumpets, and vials arranged in the most skilful manner exhibiting symmetry and beauty, as well as harmony of numbers.

☞Editors who insert the above notice, will be entitled to a copy of the work and atlas, by ordering them from No. 9 Washington street, Boston; 126 Fulton street, New-York

SLANDER.

Slander, according to Dr. Barrow, is uttering a false speech against our neighbor, to the prejudice of his fame, safety and welfare; and that out of malignant vanity, rashness, ill-nature, or bad design. The principal kinds of slander are the following: 1. Charging others with faults of which they are not guilty. 2. Affixing scandalous names, and odious characters which they deserve not. 3. Aspersing a man's actions with false names; importing that they proceed from evil principles, or tend to bad ends. 4. Perverting a man's words or acts disadvantageously by affected misconstruction. 5. Partial representations of the man's discourse, or practice; suppressing some part of the truth, or concealing some circumstances which ought to be explained. 6. Magnifying and aggravating the faults of others. 7. Imputing to our neighbor's practice, judgment, or profession, evil consequences which have no foundation in truth.

Of all characters in society, the slanderer is the most odious, and the most likely to produce mischief. "His tongue," says the great Massalon, "is a devouring fire, which tarnishes whatever it touches. It is a world of iniquity; a secret pride which discloses to us the mote in our brother's eye, while it hides from us the beam that is in our own eye. It is a mean envy, which is hurt at our neighbor's prosperity, and studies to make him the subject of its censure."

In short, it is a fire which kindles to an unquenchable flame, and preys upon the enjoyments and usefulness of thousands of the most worthy citizens of our country.—It strikes at the foundation of all social happiness. The slanderer, I conceive, may justly be looked upon as more to be dreaded than the high-way robber; for the latter only wishes to obtain the purse of his fellow, but cares not how much enjoyment he has, provided his own ends are answered; while the former cannot bear even to hear his friend well spoken of;—either as it regards his prospects, property, character, or usefulness; and when he hears the virtue of his neighbor mentioned, he is careful to call up some of what he supposes to be the man's greatest faults, and to give them a coloring which if possible will entirely destroy the confidence of his auditor in him who is so unfortunate as to be the victim of his malignant design.—Still more dreadful is this evil when found among the professed followers of Jesus Christ. Such are Satan's most successful agents in sowing the seeds of discord and contention. But such persons should remember that the awful curse of Jehovah is denounced against him that seeketh to do his neighbor wrong, and that the time is approaching when he shall hear his doom, and reap the fruit of his deeds, unless he repent and turn from his evil course, and plead for forgiving mercy while it is yet a day of grace.

MESSRS. EDITORS—Through the politeness of a friend I have been favored with the following extract from a letter of a young lady, a member of the Baptist Church in this village, who for the year past has been traveling, together with her brother, in Western New York and Ohio, and endeavoring to promote revivals of religion and the Redeemer's cause in the world. Although the communication was only designed for the eye of her "brother and friends," yet from the warm emotions of her heart, so touchingly expressed in the extract, I doubt not but it will be read with interest.

H.

Le Roy, Lake co. O. April 30, 1840.

AFFECTIONATE BROTHER AND FRIENDS.—We are this day to leave Le Roy, and are going to Munson to spend next Sabbath.—I have been in this place a number of weeks. The Lord has poured out his Spirit here, and sinners have been converted to God. It is a lovely morning—every thing is speaking forth the love and power of a GOD. The thoughts of leaving some kind friends which I love, renders the morning solemn to me; and thinking again of those I have left almost one year since, together with the thought of seeing them soon, for a moment revives my spirits.—Yet, notwithstanding all the trials we have met with, did my heavenly Father require it, and I could be made useful in building up the cause of the Redeemer, I would gladly stay another year.

Oh, my dear brothers and sisters, I often in my imagination see you in your comfortable dwellings, at ease, enjoying each other's society, and frequently greeting a tender father and mother. Shall I ever forget the home of my youth?—where we were first dandled on the knee of parental affection?—and where first we lisped forth the tender name of Father—Mother? No! It will ever live in fond remembrance. There first we felt affection's glow, and learned to cherish love and sympathy.—There first we knelt around the family altar reared by a Parent's pious hand, and heard the solemn prayer, and joined our voices in the hymn of praise. Oh! there we heard of Jesus' dying love, and learned to trust a Savior's name! Beloved home! sweet, sacred spot! Can distance, time, or pain, efface thy image from my heart? No! We may sigh in foreign lands, and mingle in the crowd of mirth and pleasure, yet oft the scenes of youth—of home and kindred friends will rise unbidden to our view; and oft our father's loved voice in imagery will greet our ear,—a mother's form will hover around us, and with her angel-voice will soothe our troubled soul.

I fear I have made but little progress in the cause of my Master since I left you; but still I can tell you, God is my present help, and many times I feel that

> "'Tis a heaven below
> My Redeemer to know."

Oh! will you pray for us? I know the prayers of the faithful avail much. God has promised that he will hear his children when they cry unto him.

Will you sing the Missionary Hymn, ('Yes, my native land I love thee,') in some of your happy hours, and think of your affectionate sister,

WHAT CONSTITUTES THE STRENGTH OF A CHURCH?

NOT NUMBERS. A church may be very numerous as to members, and yet very feeble. In proportion as a church is increased by accessions of worldly minded, unholy, and slothful members, is her power weakened. It is no strength to an army to receive accessions of soldiers who are not hearty in the cause in which they have enlisted, but who are at any time liable to act the traitor's part. And it is no strength to a church to receive accessions of members who are lovers of the world more than lovers of God, and who are liable to desert their posts at times which require the greatest decision in the cause of the Redeemer.

NOT AGE. A church may be venerable for its age, it may have existed centuries, and yet have but little strength. What has become of some of the ancient churches of New England? What has become of some of the churches planted by our fathers in the days of their pilgrimage? What has become of most of the ancient churches established by the apostles and first teachers of Christianity? Their light has become darkness. The places where they stood, present scenes of spiritual desolation.

NOT WEALTH. A church may abound in the wealth of this world without being rich toward God. Some seem to think, that if men of wealth can be brought into a church with ever so little religion, (with or without religion,) that church must be strong. But, generally speaking, churches are weakened in proportion as they trust in the wealth of this world.

NOT MENTAL ABILITY AND ACQUIREMENTS. Where is the wise? Where is the disputer of this world? Has not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? A church many contain many men of distinguished talents and learning, and yet possess but little strength.

As the strength of a church consists neither in the number of its members, nor in its age, nor in its wealth, nor in its intelligence, so it dost not consist in all of these united. A church may have a thousand members; it may have existed for many generations; it may abound in temporal possessions, and in talents and learning, and yet be very feeble. But if the strength of a church consists neither in its numbers, nor its age, nor its wealth, nor its mental abilities, nor in all these united, in what does it consist?

I. In its PIETY. Let a church be eminently pious; let all its members be holy unto the Lord; and whatever their number, wealth, and talents, that church will be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might. Let a church be a living one; let its members be truly and eminently holy; let them breathe the spirit of Christ; let them live as in the atmosphere of heaven, and their influence will be powerful and happy. Who has not observed the happy influence which a very devoted Christian sometimes exerts over the whole body of professors with whom he is connected?—Such an individual, though young, and of small worldly possessions, with the blessing of God, sometimes diffuses a holy and benign influence through the entire church of which he is a member, and is instrumental of greatly elevating the standard of piety among his brethren in Christ. If an individual Christian can effect so much good, what might not be effected by a church composed of such members? If all the members of a church were eminently pious, if they lived very near to God, so that all who witnessed them were constrained to acknowledge that they were true disciples, the power of that church—its influence on the surrounding population would be great.

Piety constitutes the strength of a church by operating in three ways, viz.

(1.) In the way of instruction. A church, formed of truly and eminently pious members, is constantly imparting rich spiritual instruction. It is a city on a hill. It is a light shining in darkness. It manifests its relation to that Life which is declared to be the Light of men. It imparts instruction by its pastor, who every Sabbath, as well as on various occasions, unfolds, defends and enforces the great principles and duties of our holy religion. It imparts instruction by its private members in the Sabbath school, forming multitudes of young immortals to virtue and piety, and preparing them to shine as lights in the world. It imparts instruction also by private conversation.—A church, composed of truly pious and spiritual members, may, by the private intercourse of those members with their acquaintances and friends, induce many cordially to embrace religion and walk in its paths. Let all who know and love the Lord, who trust in the Savior and obey his voice, recommend that Savior to their respective friends; let them in the spirit of christian kindness say to them, come with us and we will do you good, and the influence will be most happy. Let the conversations of Christians be with grace, seasoned with salt; let it flow from hearts warmed with love to God and souls, from the abundance of the heart; let the mouth speak in commendation of religion; let this be done by all the members of a church, and the consequences will be truly benign.

(2.) Piety constitutes the strength of a church by operating in the way of example. In a fair christian example there is a great moral power. Do you see an individual who evidently lives in the fear and love of God; who evidently cherishes an affectionate reliance on the Savior, and carefully walks in his steps; who evidently seeks the eternal welfare of his soul in preference to his temporal interest; who cultivates purity of heart, humility, temperance, patience and contentment; who habitually practices agreeably to the direction, 'Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them;" who manifests a sacred regard to truth, meekness, righteousness, mercy and peace; in short do you see a person who sincerely, constantly and faithfully discharges his duty toward God and man, agreeably to the principles and requirements of the sacred scriptures;—who, wherever he is, and however employed, manifests the spirit of Christ—you see one who exerts great moral power, whose influence is felt in checking and discountenancing sin, and in promoting true holiness. The world is the better and the happier on his account. Were all the members of a church such in the spirit of their minds, and in their constant deportment; did they constantly hold up the religion of Christ to the view of others by their example, how extensive and happy would be their influence. The surrounding people would either be allured to imitation by the brightness of their example, or constrained to retire from it, as unable to bear reproof.

(3.) Piety gives strength to a church by operating in the way of prayer. Prayer, it has often been justly said, is the breath of piety. Religion can no more exist in the heart without it, than a man can live without air. Every man of prayer has power with God. Elijah, by prayer, both opened and shut the windows of Heaven. A few men of prayer are a greater safeguard to a nation than powerful fleets and armies.—Prayer secures to the pious the favor of God. It brings to the aid of the cause they plead, his own almighty power. And with that power in their favor what may not a few Christians do? Were all the members of a church really and earnestly engaged in prayer, what blessings would be too great for them to expect? Their influence might be felt, not only in their own vicinity, and during their own day, but to the ends of the earth, and to the remotest period of time. The prayer of the church is mighty, because it prevails with him who has all power in heaven and on earth.—Prayer for things agreeable to his will, viewed in connexion with his power and promise, is invested with the properties of omnipotence. Let a church be composed of truly praying members, and their united, humble, fervent, persevering prayers, through the omnipotent favor of God, will open the windows of heaven, and produce spiritual blessings in a rich variety. Thus the strength of a church consists in its piety; in its piety as operating in the way of instruction, example and prayer. And if in any instance the moral influence of a church is not great and happy, it is because that church is deficient in piety.

Does the question again return, what constitutes the strength of a church? I answer,

II. UNION. In every society union is strength. This is emphatically the case with a christian church. Its strength is much in proportion to its union. Let its members, whether few or many, be drawn closely to Christ by the chords of love, and at the same time proportionably to each each other, and its strength will be great. Let the members of a church draw together in the same direction, and they can accomplish whatever they design. But if they draw in opposition to each other, they can accomplish nothing.

An immense amount of moral power is lost to the church through union. In many churches of different denominations there is such a diversity of interests and feelings, they draw in such various directions, that their power is suspended and destroyed.—Expending their whole strength in opposing one another, they can do nothing for the conversion of sinners unto God. Look at almost any church, and you will see its beauty marred and its strength weakened by internal divisions. If all the moral power which is lost to the world by the divisions and contentions of the church, were exerted in extending the empire of truth and righteousness, the result would be unspeakably happy.

It is in the piety and the union of the church that her great strength lieth. A holy prophet called on ancient Zion to put on her strength. O that Zion in our day, and in every land would hear this call!—O that every church at the East and West, whether of smaller or of great numbers, would hear this voice! The times in which we live, the circumstances that encircle us, the subjects which agitate the community, the divisions among Christians, both of Europe and America, call upon the churches of our land to cultivate ardent piety, and an affectionate union among themselves. Let me then earnestly entreat, and solemnly conjure, every professing friend of Jesus, of every name and denomination, to cultivate eminent piety, and a spirit of harmony and love.

POWER OF RELIGION.

One of the most interesting anecdotes, illustrating the power of religion, was related a few days since, in a social meeting, by an English clergyman, who was acquainted with the facts.

A nobleman, Lord———, was a man of the world. His pleasures were drawn from riches, his honors, and his friends—His daughter was the idol of his heart. Much had been expended for her education, and well did she repay, in her intellectual endowments, the solicitude of her parents. She was highly accomplished, amiable in her disposition, and winning in her manners. They were all strangeres to God.

At length Miss——— attended a Methodist meeting in London—was deeply awakened, and soon happily converted. Now she delighted in the service of the sanctuary, and social meetings. To her the charms of Christianity were overflowing. She frequented those places where she met with congenial minds, animated with similar hopes. She was often found in the house of God.

The change was marked by her fond father with painful solicitude. To see his lovely daughter thus infatuated, was to him an occasion of deep grief, and he resolved to correct her erroneous notions on the subject of the real pleasures and business of life. He placed to her disposal large sums of money, hoping she would be induced to go into the fashions and extravagancies of others of her birth, and leave the Methodist meetings. But she maintained her integrity. He took her on long journeys, conducted in the most engaging manner, in order to divert her mind from religion; but she still delighted in the Savior.

After failing in many projects which he fondly anticipated would be effectual in subduing the religious feelings of his daughter, he introduced her into company under such circumstances, that she must either join in recreation of the party, or give high offence. Hope lighted up in the countenance of her affectionate but misguided father, as he saw his snare about to entangle the object of his solicitude. It had been arranged among his friends that several young ladies should, on the approaching festival occasion, give a song, accompanied by the piano forte.

The hour arrived; the party assembled. Several had performed their parts, to the great delight of the party, which was on high spirits. Miss——— was called on for a song, and many hearts now beat high in hope of victory. Should she decline, she was disgraced: should she comply, their triumph was complete. This was the moment to seal her fate! With perfect self-posession she took her seat at the piano forte, ran her fingers over the keys, singing at the same time a beautiful melody, and with a sweet voice, the following stanzas:

> No room for mirth or trifling here,
> For worldly hopes or worldly fear,
> If life so soon is gone!
> If now the judge is at the door,
> And all mankind must stand before,
> The inexorable throne!
> No matter which my thoughts employ,
> A moment's misery or joy;
> But O! when both shall end,
> Where shall I find my destined place!
> Shall I my everlasting days
> With fiends or angels spend!

She arose from her seat. The whole party was subdued. Not a word was spoken. Her father wept aloud! One by one all of them left the house. Lord——— never rested until he became a Christian. He lived an example of Christian benevolence, having given to benvolent Christian enterprizes, at the time of his death, nearly half a million of dollars!

That life is long, which answers life's great end. One eye on death, and one full-fixed on heaven, becomes a mortal and immortal man.

MORMONS AND MORMON TENETS.

The Mormon system has a strange mixture of truth and error, strength and weakness.

1. One of their most powerful engines for making proselytes, is their interpretation of prophecies. Their views are not much unlike Miller's—the world is coming to a speedy end, and the Mormons are the saints who are to reign with Christ, (Rev. xx., &c.)

2. Another—All will be saved who have not had an opportunity to embrace Mormonism here on earth.

3. If men are good Mormons, it matters not what they do. I have in mind a most notorious drunkard received into their communion last summer.

4. They embrace substantially the views of the modern perfectionists in regard to being led by the Spirit—they cannot do wrong. Hence it is said they are led by the Spirit to do the foulest deeds.

5. No hell except for apostate Mormons; such have forgiveness neither in this life nor in that which is to come.

Of these men there is one pretty large class, who are honest-hearted, credulous, deceived, duped.

A second class attach themselves to the sect from interested motives—either lazy, shiftless, worthless men, or avaricious men, who hope to make money.

A third class, comprises the leaders—wicked, designing men; men of more or less talent, and ambitious, but who can never rise to much distinction among Christians, or who have lost their standing, and wish to regain it without repentance.

Do you inquire if their number is increasing? I have reason to believe it is—not so much, however, in the immediate vicinity of their community, where they live in a body, as by their preachers scattered around the country. Their zeal in making proselytes is worthy of a better cause. The mass of them who believe their system are ready to make any sacrifice of time, of means, of bodily effort. In one thing they must be praised; I have never known a people who read the Bible so much, and who could so readily quote any part of the Scripture. In this respect they shame all other denominations. But they have the elements of death in their system, and nothing but the fresh revelations of Joe Smith, and Sydney Rigdon, and others, to suit the passing emergency, keeps them together. For example—when the people began to murmur because they were almost entirely houseless, naked, and without bread, while their leaders fared sumptuously every day, Smith had the following "revelation:"—"Inasmuch as Joseph Smith, and Sydney Rigdon, &c., have been faithful, I, the Lord, do command that Joseph Smith, Sydney Rigdon, &c., live as it seemeth good unto them."

THE SHEPHERD OF SALISBURY PLAIN.—"The cottagers on whose behalf I have pleaded," says the curate of West Lavington, Davizes, "are to attract readers objects of some interest, as inhabitants of the village where the shepherd of Salisbury Plain resided, and whence he was gathered to the heavenly fold. His memory still lives; and his name and race are not unknown amongst us. Would to God that his piety and singleness of heart were objects of desire and imitation with those whose occupations are similar, and whose spiritual advantages are so much more abundant and accessible. His gravestone, with the annexed inscription, is visible from the window of my sick chamber, and I transcribe it as a memorial in which your committee may feel interested; nor would it be an inappropriate appendix to any future edition of that excellent tract, showing how truly his work is worthy to be praised and had in honor, whose life was a life of faith on the Son of God, and whose holy zeal in the course of Christian obedience has, by Divine grace, "provoked very many" to follow in his steps:—

"Erected in the year 1829, to the memory of
DAVID SAUNDERS,
known through every quarter of the Globe
under the appellation of the PIOUS SHEPHERD
of SALISBURY PLAIN; whose little history has now been read with admiration by multitudes of Christians in Europe' Asia, Africa, and America.
He was buried here by his sons,
September 9th, 1796, aged 70 years."

THE AFFAIRS OF EARTH KNOWN IN HEAVEN.—Of all things, a departing soul has the least cause to fear losing the knowledge of worldly affairs. If the sun gives light and heat to the earth, why should I think that blessed spirits have no acquaintance with earthly concerns? From the top of the hill I can see more than from below. And shall I know less of earth from heaven, than I now do? Is it likely that my capacity will be so little, that Christ and all the angels will be so strange to me, as to give me notice of things so interesting to my God and Redeemer; to the holy society of which I am a member, and to myself as a member of that society? Spirits are most active and of quick and powerful communication. They need not send letters, nor write books, nor lift up a voice. And as activity, so unity is greatest, when there is most perfection. Their knowledge, love and joy, will be one. My celestial advancement, therefore, will be no diminution, but an inconceivable increase, of my desirable knowledg of things on earth. If, indeed, I shall know less of below, it will be because the knowledge of them is a part of vanity and vexation, which have no place in heaven.—Baxter.

A SAILOR WHO LOST HIS LEG, BUT SAVED HIS SOUL.—A few mornings since the following fact was related in substance at the morning meeting at Park St. Vestry.

In consequence of the loss of a leg, a sailor was compelled to seek employment on shore. In his wanderings he found employment, a few weeks since, in the clothing store of Capt. B. His attention was very soon deeply interested in the subject of religion. He was soon at all our "Bethel Meetings." Some mornings he was called to breakfast. He refused, at the same time remarking with deep emotion to Capt. B., "I don't want to eat. I shall never eat any more. I shall be lost, I am such a great sinner." His employer assured him, if such were his feelings he had better go to his room, and there submit himself to his Savior. He retired to his room. Often during the day were his cries for mercy heard by the family. Mrs. B. feeling a deep solicitude for his temporal as well as for his spiritual welfare, invited him to take some food. He took his seat at the table with herself and daughter. All was silence. The food remained untouched. He was invited to ask a blessing. It was done.—And it was this. "Oh Lord, thou knowest that I hunger and thirst after righteousness; do feed me; and give us a good meeting." There was to be a meeting that evening at the "Mariner's church."

His prayer was heard. His mouth was filled with praises and thanksgiving. He rejoices that, though he has lost his leg, he had saved his soul.—Boston Recorder.

A DEVOUT SPIRIT ESSENTIAL TO MINISTERIAL SUCCESS.—No human power or efforts can do good to the souls of men, except the Spirit of God work by them, nor can any authority or might prevent that good which this divine agent is pleased to do often by feeble and unworthy instruments. To spread the gospel and to render men wise, holy and happy, we do not so much need the assistance of great abilities, eminent learning or even the powers of philosophy, eloquence and oratory, as we do men filled with the Holy Spirit, full of faith, heavenly wisdom, holiness, zeal for the glory of God, and love to the souls of men, going forth in simple dependence on the Grace and Providence of God, using no carnal weapons, but the spiritual armor provided for them, and by fervent prayer seeking a blessing from Him alone. Before such preachers, or rather, before Him who has said, "Lo I am with you," &c., mountains would become plains. When the Almighty puts forth his strength, the meanest instrument can do all things. The almond rod of Moses divides the mighty waters of the Red Sea. The mantle of Elijah stays the course of Jordan's rivers, and the shadow of Peter heals the sick. What then shall not the Gospel do, divinely constituted as it is, for the restoration of man? Oh! let the spirit of devotion burn in our pulpits; let the ministers of Jesus Christ give themselves continually unto prayer, and the early triumphing of the Gospel shall be renewed. We shall act in the faith and in the power of the Apostle.—Watchman.

PLEASURES OF VIRTUOUS AFFECTIONS.—If it be a proof of benevolence in God, that our external organs of taste should have been so framed as to have a liking for wholesome food—it is no less the proof both of a benevolent and righteous God, so to have framed our mental economy, as that right and wholesome morality should be palatable to the taste of the inner man. Virtue is not only seen to be right—it is felt to be delicious. There is happiness in the very wish to make others happy. Where is a heart's ease, or a heart's enjoyment, even in the first purposes of kindness, as well as in its subsequent performances. There is a certain rejoicing sense of clearness in consistency, the exactitude of justice and truth. There is a triumphant elevation of spirit in magnanimity and honor. In perfect harmony with this, there is a placid feeling of serenity and blissful contentment in gentleness and humanity. There is a noble satisfaction in those virtues, which, at the bidding of discipline, or by the power of self-command, may have been achieved over the propensities of animal nature. There is an elate independence of soul, in the consciousness of having nothing to hide, and nothing to be ashamed of. In a word, by the constitution of our nature, each virtue has its appropriate charm; and virtue, on the whole, is a fund of varied, as well, as of perpetual enjoyment, to him who hath imbibed its spirit, and is under the guidance of its principles. He feels all to be health and harmony within; and without, he seems as if to breathe in an atmosphere of beauteous transparency—proving how much the nature of man and the nature of virtue are in unison with each other.—Dr. Chalmers.

FOR THE MORALIST.

THE MORALIST AT THE TOP OF THE LADDER.

Soon after I settled in the ministry in the town of ——, I became acquainted with Mr. B., who was evidently one of that generation who are righteous in their own eyes, but have not, by the washing of regeneration and the application of the blood of Christ, been cleansed from sin.

Whenever I attempted to direct his attention to the all absorbing subject of salvation by Jesus Christ, and to press upon him his need of a personal interest in this salvation, he uniformly entrenched himself under what he termed his morality, and persuaded himself that he was safe for time and eternity. Sometime in the fall of—— his wife who was indulging a hope, proposed to unite with the church. She took opportunity, when alone with him, to communicate her views and gain his assent. The question was no sooner put, "Are you willing that I should unite with the church?" than he replied: "You had better see that you are fit first." She said no more; her heart was full. But the matter by the grace of God, did not end here. The thought, that his wife considered herself a Christian, and wished to confess Christ before men, broke in upon his guilty slumbers. The consideration that she was taken and he left, harrassed him by day and by night.

For months he did his utmost to stifle convictions and hide them from others.—Early in the spring, at the close of the funeral service in his neighborhood, he said to me, "Mr. ——, why don't you come here and lecture occasionally, as you used to do?" I replied, because I had no hearers; he said, "I wish you would try us again." I asked, "Will you attend?" (he rarely attended public worship;) he answered, "I will." The appointment was made, and the lecture preached. At the close of the meeting, he grasped my hand, and with a countenance full of anxiety, and wept. I inquired, "What is the matter?" He replied, "Matter enough; I have got to the top of my ladder!" I said to him, "Let go your ladder and you will do well enough." He replied, "I dare not; if I do, I shall drop into hell!" I replied, "Quit your ladder, and Christ will receive and sustain you." Soon after this, he hopefully "quit the ladder," fell into the arms of the Saviour, and found that peace which He only can give.—A few months after, Mr. B. with his wife, publicly espoused the cause of Christ, consecrating themselves and household to the Lord.

"LORD, WHAT WILT THOU HAVE ME TO DO."

Prostrate, O Lord, in dust
My spirit lies:
To Christ, my only trust,
I lift my eyes:
With doubt perplexed,
What course shall I pursue!
O show me, gracious Lord, what thou wouldst have me do!

What shall I do for thee,
My soul's best friend—
Thou, who to die for me
Didst condescend!
What trial for thee bear,
Or cross sustain,
Who bore a cross for me—a cross of scorn and pain!

My heart, by love constrained
Pants for the field,
To souls in sin enchained
Succor to yield:
But still no open path-way
Meets my view,
O tell me, gracious God, what thou wouldst have me do?

"WEEP NOT."

From a sermon by the Rev. J. Pearson, M. A.

The first point to which I would call your attention is this, that our Lord's address, "Weep not," is not to be taken for reproof of the grief evinced by the bereaved family around him. Their sorrows may have been intemperate; it may have been mingled with feelings which piety disclaims—feelings of impatience and anger under this providential visitation. But such a conclusion cannot fairly be drawn from our Lord's words, the meaning of which is to be sought for in the sentence immediately following: "She is not dead, but sleepeth." He does not, you will take notice, reproach the mourners with idle or blameable sorrow; but he cheers them with the gracious intimation, that its cause is on the point of being removed. Yes, truly, the blessed Jesus was a man of like passions with ourselves, but without any mixture of sin; and on more than one occasion, he allowed himself to discover the tenderest sensibility, for the benevolent purpose, I am satisfied, of thus proving to his people, that it is not required of them to smother their affections, and violently to force back the anguish of a bursting heart. There is scarcely a verse in the New Testament which has brought more relief to the heart of christian mourners than the shortest in the volume, "Jesus wept." He wept over the grave of his friend Lazarus; he wept on witnessing the agony of the two desolate sisters. Affection for this once happy family was, I doubt not, the principal, if not the sole, cause of the Redeemer's groans and tears; and I am content to look no further. I regard with little complacency the ingenuity that is sometimes exerted to detect more subtle, and, what are termed, more spiritual, reasons for this beautiful effusion of tenderness. Oh, no! our Redeemer was a man like ourselves, and he felt and acted agreeable to nature. It is natural to weep over the breathless remains of beloved connexions. It is natural to feel a pang when the dearest ties, formed early in life, and strengthened by many a tender association, are forever snapped asunder. It is natural to sit down and weep, when the eye that used to beam kindness and love upon us is closed in death; when the hand that has a hundred times pressed in warm friendship, is cold and stiff, and makes no return to the kindliest grasp; and when that heart is motionless, which had long beat in perfect unison with ours. If this is natural, brethren, then it cannot be wrong in the abstract; and we are sure that it is the pure original impulse of our nature, because, had it been a sinful infirmity, it could never have appeared in Christ. Your tears and sobs, when they flow from natural grief, will not displease your heavenly Father and will be healthful to yourselves, provided they are sanctified with the spirit of our great Master, who, in giving vent to pangs that almost tore his heart in sunder, could still exclaim, with the purest self-devotion, "Abba, Father, not my will, but thine be done."

Mr. GEORGE P. MAXSON is a traveling agent for this paper.

SOME OF THE THINGS A MINISTER SHOULD DO.

1. A MINISTER SHOULD COMMUNE MUCH WITH HIS OWN HEART.—He who has to do with the hearts of others should know himself. For a minister to be ignorant of his own heart would not only be a great calamity to himself, but to those with whom he labored. If the minister is worldly-minded and laboring for the meat that perisheth, nothing better may be looked for in the people over which he professes the Holy Ghost hath made him overseer. Inasmuch as the minister is a man of like passions with other men, subject to the same temptations, and liable, like other men, to be facinated by the allurements of the world, he should, while preaching to others, be jealous of his own heart, lest it should be captivated by the god of this world. If the devil, by corrupting the hearts of the lay members of Christ's church, gains much advantage to his cause, how great the advantage he would obtain by corrupting the hearts of Christ's ministers!

The preaching of the gospel appears to be the most prominent means which God employs for the conversion of the world. If, therefore, those who have this great and heavenly work committed to their charge, suffer their hearts to be duped and drawn away from God through the influence of the Prince of darkness, the work of evangelizing the world will be greatly hindered, and the cause of the enemy to the same extent will triumph. If a superior advantage may be gained by the enemy by corrupting the hearts of God's ministers, we are not to be surprised if his strongest efforts should be put forth to turn their influence in his favor, which will be effectually done if he can succeed in corrupting their hearts with the love of the world, the pride of life, and with those sensual desires which characterize the servants of sin. If, therefore, the strong efforts of the enemy are put forth to corrupt the ministry of Christ, because a more decided advantage to his cause may thereby be obtained, the minister, the more effectually to guard against this powerful and deceptive influence, should commune much with his own heart. He must carefully examine, by the light of God's word, his motives and desires.—He must see that the love of God reigns predominate within him—that it controls all the passions of his soul, and prompts him in all his efforts to extend the blessed influences of the gospel of Christ. He is to see that his heart is deeply imbued with the spirit of Christ—that the zeal, love and compassion of the Savior constrains him to beseech men to be reconciled to God.

2. HE SHOULD COMMUNE MUCH WITH GOD.—The nature of his calling and employment evidently require this. If any being on earth should live in a holy nearness with God, it is the gospel minister.—He that is called and sent out by the counsel of heaven on an errand of heavenly mercy, should possess the spirit and temper of heaven. His soul should be filled with heavenly light and love, and purity; and how shall this be obtained but by communing with God, the life, light, and bliss of heaven? The minister of the cross is not to be engaged in an earthly but heavenly employment—an employment that became the Son of God—an employment in which not only fallen men but God and angels are interested. Should beings, to whom is committed this holy blessed work, be earthly-minded? No. The heavenly message should fill their souls, and hands, and mouths, while they appear unto men, not as angels, but as the "servants of the most high God, which show unto us the way of salvation." To do this, like Moses, whose face shone as he ascended the mount where he had been conversing with God, the countenance and deportment of the minister should indicate that he has been much with Christ. O that ministers were more in communion with God! that they could mix less of earth with their high and holy calling! Then would the word of God have free course, run and be glorified. Ministers that have been most eminent for usefulness have been much given to prayer. From this source they have derived their wisdom, strength, and holy zeal.

3. HE SHOULD STUDY MUCH THE WORD OF GOD.—This should be made the man of his counsel; for by it the man of God is thoroughly furnished to every good word and work. The minister of the cross should be mighty in the scriptures. By him they are to be wielded as the sword of the spirit in repeling the forces of the enemy, and with a "thus saith the Lord" is he to rear the standard of Immanuel, and vindicate the character and claims of the Lord Jesus.

As the herald of salvation he is to go forth bearing the message of heaven, saying, "Hear ye the word of the Lord." He should therefore set himself upon the watch-tower to see what God would say unto him. He should hear the words from HIS mouth, and warn the people from HIM. The scriptures are to be received as the word of the Lord. To know the scriptures is to know what God would say unto us. To depart from them would be attended with incalculable mischief to the cause of truth, and to the souls of our dying fellow-men.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We have a number of communications on hand, which will receive attention as soon as circumstances will admit.

A CHURCH ORGANIZED.—A Seventh-day Baptist Church was organized at Pawcatuck Bridge, Westerly, R. I., on Thursday, April 16th, consisting of about fifty members.

☞ Post Masters and Agents are requested to be particular when they transmit money for the Register, or wish to have the P. O. address of a subscriber changed, to state definitely at what Post Office the subsribers to whom the money is to be credited, receive their papers. This will save us much time and confusion in regulating our books.

☞ We welcome to our table editorial the "Olive Branch," which hails us from Boston, the "New Haven Record," from New Haven, Ct., and the "Western Recorder," from Zanesville, O.

☞ Mr. S. N. SWEET, Professor of Elocution, will deliver a Lecture this (Tuesday) evening, at the Chapel of the De Ruyter Institute, at half past 7 o'clock, on Oratory, interspersed with recitations and imitations of some of the most celebrated living speakers in the United States. We think that those who favor Mr. Sweet with their attendance will be amply remunerated for their trouble.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Register.

DEAR BRETHREN—I send you an extract of a letter from the Rev. J. Nicolayson, to Rev. Edward Bickersteth, London, Missionary of the London Society, dated, JERUSALEM, 1839. I believe it will be read with interest, and that it will encourage the hearts of our brethren to pray and act in behalf of that greatly benighted, and deeply afflicted people. I trust the day is beginning to dawn upon them in the East, and I hope ere long it will send its rays of Divine light upon the Israelites in this Western Hemisphere. I rejoice that the Jews are not in every part of the world, invulnerable to the truths of the everlasting Gospel.

W. B. MAXSON.

"Notwithstanding the slow progress, and the many and various perplexities, anxieties, and vexations of it, the history of the purchase of the ground for the church [in Jerusalem] can be briefly given. It was finally concluded early in September last.—I must not attempt to describe the ground, and yet I must just tell you that it is in the very best situation, right on Mount Zion, directly opposite the castle of David near the Jaffa gate, just bordering on the Jewish quarter. It consists of two adjoining houses with premises and gardens, and is just sufficient for the erection of the church, and houses for four mission families. Moreover, some adjoining premises may yet be had if required. The whole amount of the purchase expenses is £800 [about $3,550.] The purchase was (of necessity) made in the name of a trusty native, an American Christian. But I have made application to his Highness Mahommed Ali Pasha for permission to purchase, and hold it in my own name, and I expect a favorable answer by the steamer now due. It will then be transferred into my own name, to be held for the trustees of the Society. Contracts have been made for building materials to be ready against spring, when, if duly authorized, and furnished by the Committee, I shall commence the work, please God; and so I trust we shall, in due time, see a Protestant church completed in Mount Zion. But what is of more importance, I can tell you of a nucleus of a living church already begun to form, not only of those who have been sent us from England, but of converts on the spot, or at least, candidates of whom we have seven in number; one family of four, and three single individuals. These all attend our services, and are under regular instruction. Some of them I hope to baptize next Easter.

But let me now attempt a hasty sketch of the history of this mission. Early in July last, Messrs. Pieritz and Levi joined me. The plague was then in the city, but as soon as it subsided, the missionary work was resumed with trebled energy. Discussions were daily held with Jews, either at our house or theirs, or in their synagogues; and some general stir excited. In the latter half of August, I had to make a journey to Barout, on behalf of the purchase. During my absence, a young rabbi, who had already come frequently for discussion, made an open (perhaps a premature) confession of his faith in Christ. The rabbies now took alarm. He was forced to divorce his wife, and at length prevailed upon to leave for Constantinople. We still entertain hopes of him, but the rabbies have succeeded in preventing his being baptized in the Holy city as the first rabbi of this place. Our other proselytes were not previously residents in this city. Some of them are natives of Poland and Wallachia, and one of Mogadore; and had only lately come here. The rabbies now issued a formidable ban or excommunication against all who should come near us. From the absolute despondence of the Jews here upon the resources of Europe, which are under the control of the chief rabbies, such a measure is tantamount to the punishment of starvation. All communication with them was, therefore, now completely cut off. Our hope, under God, was in the expected arrival of a missionary physician, whose influence might break the terrible spell. On the 7th of December, Dr. Gerstmann arrived, and a very few days sufficed to realize that hope. Nothing could stand before him, or rather before the need and eagerness of the poor and suffering Jews to obtain medical aid. From that time, the direct missionary work has revived with increased power. We have now all our hands full. Very encouraging tokens of good have appeared since. An earnest desire after the Hebrew bible is frequently expressed, and often also after the New Testament. Several individuals come regularly, not so much for discussion as for instruction. We have two Nicodemuses, who, holding like him, a prominent place among the rabbies, feel it necessary for the present, to act on his plan, and come secretly and by night for fear of the Jews. I cannot enter into the details of our internal arrangements; but I will now add a sketch of our ecclesiastical history. Ever since the 22d of July, we have had regular worship every Lord's day in the full form of our church, [Episcopal] in the morning in English, and in the afternoon in Arabic; and since the 23d of September, in the evening, in German. So you see I have to preach three times every Lord's day, in three different languages, and to read the service too. On the 5th of August, I administered the sacrament of the Lord's supper, for the first time it has ever been administered in Jerusalem in the order of our Church. We were then only four communicants. Since that time I have continued to administer it every first Sunday in the month, and our numbers have increased since. Last time, the first Sunday in the present year, we were six, and next time, perhaps, we may hope to be eight, being joined by our still expected Consul and his lady. At Easter, and thence forward we shall, please God, have an accession of communicants from among our present candidates for baptism. Ever since the 25th of July, we have had daily morning and evening prayers in Hebrew, in a room set apart and fitted up for that purpose, in my own house, till it shall be superseded by a regular church. At this service, our full and regular attendance amounts only to ten persons as yet. We have occasionally, but rarely a stranger (Jew) to join us. Thus you will see that I am pretty fully occupied with ministerial work already. To this is to be added daily instruction to candidates for baptism in German and Hebrew, besides the secular work of purchase, building, renting, repairing and the general correspondence of the mission and its accounts. I trust that these hasty sketches will tend to engage your interest, and call forth your thanksgiving on our behalf. Allow me now to try to enlist your sympathies with us and your intercessions for us, by attempting an account of our two grand difficulties.

The first and chief, that of finding employment or rather support in the way, and by means of employment, for proselytes and enquirers. This is a most pressing difficulty. The Society's means must not be touched, and our own resources are already overcharged. Simeon and family fall to my share, two others to Mr. Pieritz's, and one to the Doctor's; but it is a growing, as well as a pressing difficulty. Unless we leave the place, we shall have more to provide for. We dare not stop preaching to the Jews, and arguing with them from fear of their becoming convinced of the truth; and yet we are almost driven to it, for what shall we do with those thus convinced? It is absolutely impossible that they can live here without our assistance, and whither shall they go? Shall we bid them deny Christ again, yea curse him, and return to the Synagogue? or shall we exhort them to resign themselves to starvation? But how can we do this so long as we have bread ourselves? On this principle, ought we not to starve with them? Another alternative surely must be found if possible. It is indeed the intention of the Committee, in the course of time, to place the mission here on such a footing, that much might be done to furnish employment; but this lies far off yet in the distant and uncertain future, and our wants are immediate and pressing. A special fund must be raised for furnishing the means of support by employment to proselytes and decided inquirers at Jerusalem in immediate connection with the mission. I have written to Mr. Cartwright on the subject, and would earnestly beg that you too would lend us a helping hand. If this measure is brought fairly and fully before the Christians in England, it will operate as a practical test to prove whether the church is being prepared for the conversion of the Jews. It will then appear whether the fulfillment of St. Paul's prophecy, "By your (Gentiles) mercy, they (Jews) shall obtain mercy," is at hand, at least in its beginning, or yet afar off; it will bear in the same way upon that other sign of the time in the 102d Psalm. But as all are not prophets, nor even students of prophecy, let the simple fact be pressed home upon all Christians, that the mission at Jerusalem must either be broken up just now, when the work is fully opening to us, and exactly because it opens too rich promises of success, or else a fund must be raised for the purpose as stated above. Christians will then have to make their choice between these two alternatives. If they choose the former, we shall need no church here either, unless the wish is to establish a regular convent, that shall firmly bolt its iron doors against both Jews and Gentiles, and take care not to let its light shine before men, lest they should see the truth and embrace it.

We have another, less vital indeed, but still important difficulty. The medical department, is intimately connected with, nay essential to the practical bearing of the mission on its direct object, as the link of connection between it and the Jews. It ought, therefore, to be rendered as efficient as possible; but here our next material difficulty meets us. The abject poverty and absolute destitution of the poorer classes of the Jews here are such as to threaten to defeat, in a great measure, the professional labors of the doctor among them. I accompanied him lately to about a dozen of his poorer patients, (and these not the very worst either, he says,) and such was the appalling misery I witnessed among them, that I immediately resolved to lend the Doctor every possible assistance to obtain some relief at least for these sufferers, so as to render their recovery often from very loathsome diseases, brought on by absolute destitution, possible at least. We want a hospital then for this purpose. But be not alarmed at the notion of a London hospital; our idea is this:—If, by making application to Christian friends on this subject, we can obtain £1, or £5, or £10, or £15, we will apply these to procure a little broth for one, a little linen for another, &c. If we could obtain £20, we could then begin by taking a clean and airy room, and remove the most destitute patients into it.

Some native christians, both of the Latin and Greek church, being regular attendants at the Arabic service, are anxious to fully join our church by admission to the Lord's supper; I have hitherto succeeded in putting them off, and shall endeavor to do so until we get properly organized, and have a location of our own; but then they remain unconnected with any Church; as they have for a time broken off all connection with their own churches. I shall need a clerical assistant by and by. During the winter months I have vigor enough both of body and mind; but during the relaxing summer months, which make up at least two thirds of the year here, I know not how I shall get on. Luther used to say, "Deus providebit," and I will endeavor to say the same.

I hope dear sir, that this scrawl may serve to make you abound still more and more in your prayers and intercessions for me, for us all, and for our work."

REVIVAL RECORD.

For the Register.

MESSRS. EDITORS—The interest which I have felt while reading in the Register accounts of revivals of Religion in different parts of our country, and a desire to promote, and cause to be more general, such revivals, prompts me to write a few lines, which, if worthy of a place in your paper, you will confer a favor by inserting them.

After having lamented the apathy which has characterized some proffessing to be disciples of Christ—and having mourned over the "desolations of Zion," and deeply regretted the want of that love which constitutes the genuine child of God; what can possibly create in the bosom of the truly humble, pious and devoted soldier of the cross greater joy than to witness a revival of the cause and spirit of Him who has said "learn of me"! It is truly delightful to witness the manifestations of the Holy Spirit in the exercise of that union and christian affection which operate as a powerful evidence of revealed religion, being in reality a pure principle which has power to prepare the church to be the "light of the world," and the "salt of the earth." Would not such a state of the church militant be a cause of rejoicing among angels as well as good men?—Would it not cheer the drooping spirits of the aged veterans, who have long been walking "as pilgrims and strangers on earth?" Would it not animate the dear youth to walk in wisdom's ways, and prove that they are "pleasantness and peace?"—If then the happiness of men is in exact proportion to the amount of religion or love to God and his creatures possessed, who that is a christian but will pray and act in accordance with his prayer for the out-pouring of the spirit of God; which alone can, as the great and glorious cause, produce these blessed effects?

Last Sabbath I had the happiness of meeting with the church at Otselic, where our beloved brother Curtis was instrumental, under God, of gathering into the fold, and as a faithful shepherd feeding the sheep and lambs who were purchased by the blood of the blessed Christ. We had a feast on earth, but he, (we trust,) in heaven receiving his reward among the just, while we enjoyed the means of gospel grace in the capacity of worshipers here. This church has enjoyed the labors of our beloved brother Wescote, which have been those of love and zeal for the interest of the church and the salvation of sinners.—God has been pleased graciously to awaken, revive, and water, this branch of his Zion. After trying to preach the gospel to them, last Sabbath, I baptized, and received into the Otselic Church, four persons to whom, with the other members of that and sister churches, I administered the communion. There are yet more waiting for an opportunity to follow the example of Christ in Baptism. O may the truth prevail, the peaceable kingdom of God be established, revivals be extended in the world till Christ shall reign triumphantly!

Yours, in christian affection,

S. M. B.

Lincklaen, 28th May, 1840.

The pastor of the Frewill Baptist Church in Batavia, writing to a brother clergyman of this town, gives some interesting particulars of a revival of religion, which has been in progress in his church for some time past, and remarks: "The work is now progressing with great promise at Bushville, three and a half miles west of Batavia village. One of the converts at that place is a Mr. Perkins, a rum tavern keeper, who since he submitted to God, has committed his sign to the flames, and put up a TEMPERANCE SIGN, cleared his bar of the poisonous stuff, and declares he will go to the poor house, rather than engage in the business of rum selling again."—American Citizen.

Lowell, May 1st, 1840.

"In all the evangelical churches in this city, there is a powerful revival of God's holy work. By an estimate as accurately made as it can be, it appears that there have been about one thousand conversions in this city since the 1st of January last, and there is no apparent abatement of the interest in any church; indeed, I am rejoiced to say, that it is daily increasing, and to be able to state that there has probably been a greater number of conversions within the last ten days, than during the same time since the revival commenced.

Barkhampsted, Ct.—A revival of uncommon power exists in this place, extending to most of the population of the town, silencing the cavils of objectors, and embracing errorists of every description.

North Guilford.—The work of grace continues with but little abatement. Many young people, and some in middle life, are indulging hope. Most of the unconverted in the congregation have manifested much anxiety for their salvation. The pastor, has been assisted, in some special efforts, by Rev. Mr. Granger.

North Haven.—116 were added to the church in this place, Sabbath before last, as the first fruits of the revival.

North Bradford, Ct., is now enjoying a season of very strong religious interest.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

LATER FROM CHINA.

By the Eben Preble, Capt. Crocker, advices from Canton to the 28th of January have been received. The Courier of this morning gives the following summary.

The blockade of the port which had been declared by the British, had been raised on the following day, in consequence of the liberation by the Chinese of the British subject, whose detention was the alleged cause of the blockade. Several American vessels then hurried to Canton without cargoes, a circumstance which puzzled the Chinese, the previous arrivals having brought full cargoes, and they in consequence issued a chop, forbidding the Ann McKim, Valparaiso and Lintin, taking away more cargoes than each had brought specie to pay for, requiring that the specie be in the first instance placed in the possession of the hong merchants.

The British superintendant had received despatches from his government, conveying to him their approbation of the course of conduct he had adopted, and announcing to him the approaching arrival of a large British force. One of the British ships of war had sailed from Canton, in search it was given out by Capt. Elliott, of the remains of an English ship which he alleged he had heard was wrecked on some part of the coast, but it is supposed the real object was to put herself in communication with the British vessels as they arrived.

The Chinese were endeavoring to purchase three or four foreign vessels to convert them into floating batteries, and anchor them, within the Bogue, to resist the expected attack from the English. The general belief among the foreign residents, however, was that the Chinese would submit on the arrival of the British forces.

The high commissioner Lin had been sent to the province of Tong as viceroy, and another officer had taken his place at Canton, who the Chinese merchants apprehended would be still less favorably inclined toward them than his predecessor.

There was no change in the market at Canton when the Eben Preble sailed, and the quotations for exports were entirely nominal.

From the extracts copied from the Journal of Commerce, we learn that on the 1st of January Captain Elliott applied to the Portuguese governor of Macao for leave to deposite British cargoes at that port, on payment of the regular duties—not for sale, but merely to enable the ships to discharge and take their departure. The request was not granted, the Governor deeming it incompatible with his engagements to the Chinese government.

On the petition of Mr. Snow, the American consul, an edict was issued on the 27th of December, declaring the port open to American ships with cargoes taken in at Manilla, Singapore and other places, actually purchased there by American merchants. The edict is in nature explanatory of a former one, which, the China authorities say, "was pointed at goods transhipped from English vessels." American vessels are also permitted to go up to Whampoa before being examined by the consul.

The Canton Register affirms the sale of the American ship Helen Douglas, late armed British ship Cambridge, to the Chinese authorities; and some other vessels are named for which they were in treaty.—N. Y. Spectator.

SUMMARY.

FROM THE PACIFIC.

Lima, Peru, Feb. 11, 1840.

There is a report rife in the city to-day that Peru has declared war against Bolivia; certain it is that transports are now sailing for the South—one has already sailed with troops. The report states that the Bolivians are on the frontiers of Peru, with 9000 men. If this be true it is a larger force than Peru can bring into the field against them. It is further stated that revolutionary movements are going at Payta and Truxillo; Gen. Abrajosa is at the latter place to quell the disturbances. The President, it is said will soon leave Lima to take command of the army in the South, against Bolivia.

I give you these reports as we hear them. It is a difficult matter to get at the truth of anything that is going on, until demonstrations are made; things are done in secret session—none but the immediate friends of the President are, it seems, in the cabinet secrets. It is the impression, generally, that Santa Cruz is again growing stronger here, and that he is now preparing himself to pounce down upon President Gamarra and his party, with 10,000 men, from Bolivia and Upper Peru. I shall not be surprised if there is a general revolution in Peru and Bolivia, within the next six months and at the end of twelve months, or less, if we find General Santa Cruz, the late President of Peru and Bolivia, again at the head of affairs here.

This is a sad state of things. These intestine wars and revolutions are bringing misery upon the country; poverty is staring the Government in the face at every turn; the soil is neglected; commerce and trade are at a stand. Under this aspect of affairs, how can the country prosper, and the people be even tolerably comfortable?

News reached here to-day that Chili is in great excitement; that the "patriots" have routed the late President and his administration "horse, foot, and dragoons," and that Chili is now under the direction of a provincial government.—Phila. U. S. Gazette.

STEAM BOAT EXPLOSION ON THE CONNECTICUT.

A fatal explosion of the boiler of a steam boat took place on the 18th instant, on the Connecticut, a few miles below Northampton, Massachusetts. The Northampton Republican of May 20th, gives the following account of the disaster:

Calamitous Steamboat explosion in Northampton.—Steamboat disasters in the quiet waters of the Connecticut river, are of very rare occurrence, none having ever happened north of Hartford until the catastrophe which it becomes our painful duty to narrate. The steamboat Greenfield, which runs in the Conneticut, between Montague and Hartford, for the purpose of towing the flat boats, was blown up last Monday afternoon, near Smith's Ferry, occasioning much damage and loss of life.—She left the city of Hartford on Monday morning, and came through South Hadly Canal, with four boats in tow. When near Smith's Ferry she stopped her machinery for the purpose of taking in tow two more. The boat of Mr. Strong, of this village, was in the act of dropping astern when the explosion took place, which literally blew the Greenfield into atoms, and stove in the side of a flat boat abreast of her, loaded with salt, so that both sunk immediately.

The engineer, Mr. Wood, of Brattleborough Vt., was killed, and Mr. Crawford, the captain. and Mr. Lancey, a Merchant of Springfield, were both so much injured that it was thought they would not long survive their wounds. Both were shockingly bruised and mangled. Mr. Ebenezer Morse, of this town, who was standing on Mr. Strong's boat, was blown into the water, and taken up senseless, but was found not to be seriously injured. The fireman was also slightly injured. There were thirty hands attached to the boats, but those only hurt, we believe whom we have mentioned. The goods in the flat boats, are supposed to be owned in Greenfield. The steamboat Greenfield was new, and this was her seconed trip. The boat was owend by Allen, Root & Co., of the town from which the vessel was named.

P. S. Since the above was in type, we have learned that Captain Crawford and Mr. Lancey are dead.

A Tragedy.—The New York public no doubt recollect a very expert juggler who long exhibited his legerdemain tricks here under the name of Monsieur Adrien, the great magician. Attracted by his father's fame and success, his son afterward visited us and performed here a short time under the name of Monsieur Adrien, Jun. Letters received from Montgomery, Alabama, mention that the latter had there met his death, and give the following detail of the circumstances attending it.

It appears that the younger Adrian, in the pursuit of his calling, arrived at Montgomery, and that in the course of his exhibitions there, he attracted the attention of a lady, who, under the influence we should say of some potent spells and incantations dire, but not poor Adrien's, seems to have cast herself into his arms, and forced him, nolens-volens, as the letters subsequently discovered abundantly show, to connive at her elopement. She was found on board a steamboat by her friends, and carried home.

Adrian, who was lodging at the Montgomery Hall, hearing of the circumstance, immediately fled, and took to the woods, where he wandered about during the night in a miserable state of alarm, able to hold intercourse with no one, as he scarce spoke a word of English, and in fact imagining that every one he saw was a murderer. In the morning, however, he got to a place called Hine's ferry, about 12 miles from Montgomery, and had embarked on board the ferry boat in the hope of getting across the river, when he was overtaken by three individuals who had set out armed in the morning in pursuit of him. They were Dr. M'Leod, the lady's husband, her father and uncle, Mr. Robert E. Coxe. They called to the ferryman and threatened to shoot him if he did not stop the boat. On hearing this, Adrien jumped into the river, and was on the point of sinking when he was shot dead by Dr. M'Leod. The body was then carried to Montgomery, a jury held over it, and as a letter writer says, a verdict returned of the "severest character possible."

The letters add that general commisseration was felt by the people at large for the fate of Adrien, from a conviction that he was innocent, but that the character of the parties implicated would prevent any serious inquiry into the subject, and indeed any publication at Montgomery in relation to it. A hope was expressed that Mons. Adrien, Senior, would arrive there, and that, with the aid of counsel from another state, he would certainly be supported by the people in obtaining justice on the perpetrators of the death of his son.—Courier.

Loss of the Ship Poland.—This was struck by lightning on Saturday, the 16th inst., in latitude 41 35, longitude 58 30, at 3 P. M., during a severe shower of rain, wind about southwest. The lightning struck the foretop gallant yard on the larboard side, and ran down the ties to the foreyard, thence along the foreyard to the head of the foremast, where it knocked off a piece of the fid of the topmast. It ran down the mast into the lower hold, where it is supposed she set fire to the cotton which was stowed near the mast.

After an ineffectual attempt to get at the fire to extinguish it, the men being driven from their work by the smoke, the hatches were closed about 8 o'clock and the males and children, with as many men as thought proper, were put into the long boat, and moored astern, where they remained all night, and the next day at night, until Monday morning—the ship being hove to, in order to be easy, and in hopes of being discovered by some passing vessel.

On Monday morning—the wind having very much increased, with a rising sea, and the fire not appearing to have increased much, the boats were hoisted in again and sail made to the northeast. About one o'clock, P. M. a sail was discovered, and the ship was put before the wind to speak her.

At 3 P. M. spoke the ship Clifton, and Captain Ingersoll immediately complied with their request to be taken off, and assisted in saving all hands with his boat.

The ship was abandoned about 10 o'clock, A. M., at which time the fire was very fast increasing. And the decks were growing hotter every minute. The passengers and crew saved but little except the cloths they had on, and a few light articles of small value.

The Tornado at Natchez.—The number of persons ascertained to have been killed at Natchez in the tornado on the 13th inst. was 41, viz. 37 whites and 4 blacks; and fifty-six persons were lying at that time wounded in the hospital. The number lost by drowning, or who still remained buried under the ruins was variously estimated from 200 to 400. The committee delegated by the citizens of New Orleans to visit Natchez, estimate the whole number who perished at 400. The aggregate loss of property in buildings and goods, according to the most careful estimate, is stated at $1,069,360. Some other wholesale estimates carry it up to five millions. The Presbyterian and Methodist churches, it is said, are so much injured, that it will be necessary to rebuild them. The Episcopal church escaped with little damage.—The Natchez theatre is a pile of ruins. Porker's the Planters' and the steamboat hotels were blown down, but the City hotel was not much injured. Among the deaths is that of Judge Keeton, of Concordia, who was instantly killed in Vidalia, while at dinner.

Murder in Philadelphia.—A villain of the name of Rox, was some time since arrested for a murder committed in Philadelphia—tried, found guilty, and sentenced to the penitentiary on a verdict of manslaughter. He was subsequently pardoned out by the Governor—the plea of insanity—caused as usual by intoxication—inducing the jury in the first place to save his neck from the gallows, and the Governor to set him at large. As may be expected in such cases, the murderer has tried the same game over again—and on Thursday night, murdered a man of the name of Thomas, in a drinking house, at Kensington. They were both partially intoxicated. The murderer has been arrested.

St. Augustine, May 8th.

Indian Fight.—Capt. Rains, of the 7th Infantry, is in command of Fort King, and with the most laudable ambition of doing effective service, has been employed in efforts at the destruction of the enemy. But a short time since, some of his men were killed, as they left the garrison; and he determined on placing shells under cover of a blanket, in the hope that their cupidity might induce them to appropriate the articles, and thus fire the fuse, sending death among them. During the night he heard an explosion, and on repairing to the spot in the morning, with eighteen men, he discovered traces of blood and scattered clothing, as well as pony tracks. Captain Rains immediately charged upon the Indians, who took shelter among trees, and continued the discharge of rifles at his little band.—The fight was kept up with great spirit, until the leader of the enemy, Alectustenugge, fell, when he was immediately borne off, and the Indians retreated. Captain Rains was mortally wounded by the chief—when the command devolved on Serjeant Jackson, who behaved in the most gallant manner, and revenged the fall of his captain by shooting Alectustenugge, after being severely wounded himself.

The loss of the whites was 2 killed and 3 wounded—that of the enemy 4 killed.—The enemy numbered 93.—News.

A scout, in the neighborhood of Micanopy, a few days since came upon a party of Indians, who made a charge upon them. They broke and fled. The serjeant, in attempting to bayonet one of the number, was shot through the body, but made every effort to kill the enemy, until he fell from his horse, and immediately expired.—Ibid.

The Vicksburg Sentinel of the 7th contains this alarming paragraph:

The news down the river yesterday is one of the most gloomy character. We had for some time indulged in a faint hope that the high waters, which, for some weeks, have threatened us with an overflow, would subside, before the summer floods would reach us. But we regret to learn that the rivers above are rising with unexampled rapidity, and that an overflow is now inevitable, such as has not been known since 1816. It is believed that the whole valley of the Mississippi for upwards of one thousand miles will be a perfect sea; and that the present crops of sugar, cotton, corn, and vegetables, in alluvial lands, will be entirely destroyed. Such a calamity could be badly borne at any time; but under the present circumstances it will destroy the last hopes of a large portion of our planters.

Slavers Captured.—We learn from the American Consul at Zanzibar, that her H. B. Majesty's Sloop of War, Protest, arrived at Majunga about the 20th of December, from a cruise, having captured the Spanish Brig Scorpion, a slaver with 670 slaves on board, which were purchased at Quilamane, and the Portuguese brig Andie, with six slaves on board, bound from Mozambique to Quilamane. The sloop of War sent them both to the Cape of Good Hope. The Protest left Majunga the 10th January for Quilamane river to arrest the sailing of several slave ships which were loading with slaves at Quilamane, and which the Protest was expecting to capture.—Salem Register.

More Murders by the Indians.—Three Families Murdered.—By the steamer Hyperion, which arrived last evening, we have received the melancholy intelligence of the murder of three more families by the Indians, since that of Mr. McLane noticed in yesterday's paper. The name, however, of but one has been ascertained by us, that of Mr. Lamb, about 8 miles from Blountstown and within a few miles of a military post. They attacked his house on Friday evening and shot him while endeavoring to escape. There were in the house at the time of the attack several other persons two of whom were severely wounded. After they had killed and driven from their homes the family, they pillaged the house, and set it on fire, with several outhouses.

The other families that were attacked lived in the neighborhood, several of whom were killed, but we have not been able to learn their names.

The Indians who committed these depredations are said to number about fifty or sixty, and conceal themselves in the hammocks between the Apalachicola river and Tallahassee until a favorable opportunity offers for them to commit such deeds. This forms the fourth family which has been murdered in that vicinity since the 22d ult.—Apalachicola, Gaz. May 10.

Coroner's Inquest.—In the afternoon of yesterday, the coroner held an inquest in an alley at the back of the Edwin Forrest Tavern, in Market street, close to McArano's garden, on the body of George Cathcart, aged 56 years. It appeared from the evidence, that the deceased hung himself out of the attic window of his house, exclaimining "I am gone!" His wife hearing him, ran up stairs and cut the rope with a knife, when he fell into the street. He lived some hours afterward. He was a man of intemperate habits. Verdict, death caused by hanging.—Phila. Amer.

Melancholy Accident.—On Saturday, a lad named John Hodge, an apprentice to William Caswell, in Charlestown, went on board a schooner lying at Caswell's wharf, and after conversing some time with a young man on board, expressed an intention of going into the cabin to get some ship biscuit to eat. The young man, in a playful manner, told him he should not go—and took up a gun which he presumed was not loaded—cocked it, pointed it at him—telling him, in a laughing way, that if he persisted, he would shoot him. Hodge, however, pressed on, and the trigger was drawn. The gun was charged with buck shot—and the contents lodged in the upper part of his face and forehead. One of the shot entered the eye, and probably penetrated to the brain. He was living yesterday—suffering great pain—but no hopes are entertained of his recovery.—Boston Journal.

A Fatal Mistake.—We learn from the Chambersburgh Repository, that on Friday last, two young men by the name of Alfred Cronan and William Thomas of that place, took, through mistake, a quantity of Cedar oil, the effect of which was so powerful as to prostrate both of them. Medical aid was promptly applied, but it was too late to save the life of Cronan, who lingered till Monday morning last, when he died. The other is yet alive, but very ill, and will probably recover. The cedar oil was mistaken for peppermint—bottles of each standing together. Be careful.

Fatal Accident at Hempstead Harbor.—A little girl, adopted daughter of John Seaman, aged about 8 years, was caught in the machinery of the mill and so much injured that she survived the accident only a few hours.—Jamaica Farmer.

The Flood Below.—We have the most distressing account, from a gentleman who left New Orleans on the first of May, in the Steamboat Gen. Brown, of the flood in the Mississippi. Nearly the whole country from the Ohio to New Orleans is under water.—The town-plat of Cairo is completely submerged, and great fears are entertained of the destruction of New Orleans.—Cin. Gaz. May 12.

Speculation and Suicide.—James Quick, a store keeper in Belvidere, Warren co., N. J. committed suicide on the 3d inst. by cutting his throat. He was between 60 and 70 years old, and had been engaged with his son in some grain speculations which left the two indebted to an amount exceeding one hundred thousand dollars.—Their liabilities were falling due, the means to meet them were not possessed, the son ran away, and the father despatched himself as above stated.

Marrying by Wholesale.—A curious ceremony lately took place at the church of St. Germain l' Anxerrisois in Paris, where three brothers married three sisters. The same service did for the whole party.

Mr. Parsons has a second time renounced the stage, and again been received into the fellowship of the Methodist Episcopal church at Louisville, Ky.

Hon. Aaron Vail has been appointed Charge d'Affairs at the Court of Spain, and the Hon. A. H. Rogers to Sardinia.

Colleges.—The Christian Review states that there are 95 Colleges in the United States, containing about 9,500 students, 27 medical schools, with about 2,750 students, and 8 law schools, with 350 students.

London is said to comprise an æra of 70 square miles, and has a population at this time of 1,950,000.

It is said that the Rev. Mr. Newton, during the session of the great Conference recently held at Baltimore, stated that he had been a Wesleyan Methodist minister about 40 years; during that time he had traveled nine thousand miles a year, and on an average had been engaged in about twelve public exercises a week during that whole period.

It is said the slaves in Canada who ran away from the southern states, has petitioned Parliament for a naturalization law, by which they will become citizens—as in the event of a war with the states they may be re-captured, and again held as slaves.

POETRY.

NOT ON A PRAYERLESS BED.

We have often seen, and if we mistake not, have given the following in some former volume, but at this moment, not being allowed time to ascertain the fact, we are glad to be indebted for it to a late number of the Banner of the Cross.—Ed. Mess.

Not on a prayerless bed, not on a prayerless bed,
Compose thy weary limbs to rest,
For they alone are blest,
With balmy sleep,
Whom angels keep.
No! not though by care oppress'd,
Or thought of anxious sorrow
Nor though in many coil perplexed.
For coming morrow,
Lay not thy head
On prayerless bed.

For who can say, when sleep thine eyes shall close,
That earthly care and woes
To thee may e'er return—
Rouse up my soul,
Slumber control,
And let thy lamps burn brightly;
So shall thine eyes discern,
Things pure and sightly;
Taught by the Spirit,
Never—on prayerless bed
To lay thine unblest head.

Bethink thee, slumb'ring soul, of all that's promised,
To faith in holy prayer,
Lives there within thy breast
A worm that gives unrest;
Ask peace, from Heaven,
Peace will be given;
Humble self-love and pride,
Before the Crucified,
Who for thy sins hath died;
Nor lay thy weary head,
On thankless, prayerless bed.

Hast thou no pining want, or wish, or care,
That calls for holy prayer!
Has thy day been so bright,
That in its flight,
There is no trace of sorrow?
And, art thou sure the morrow
Will be like this, and more
Abundant! Dost thou lay up thy store
And still make place for more!
Thou fool! this very night
Thy soul may wing its flight.

Hast thou no being than thyself more dear,
Who tracks the ocean deep,
And when storms sweep
The wintry lowering skies,
For whom thou wak'st and weepest?
Seek there the covenant ark of prayer;
For he that slumbereth not is there,
His ears are open to thy cries—
Oh then! on prayerless bed,
Lay not thy thoughtless head.

Hast thou no lov'd one than thyself more dear
Who claims a prayer from thee!
Some who ne'er bend the knee,
From infidelity?
Think, if by prayer they're brought
Thy prayer—to be forgiven,
And making peace with Heaven,
Unto the Cross are led!
Oh! for their sake on prayerless bed,
Lay not thy unblest head.

Arouse thee, weary soul—nor yield to slumber.
Till on Communion blest,
With the Elect thou rest,
Those souls of countless number!
And with them raise
The note of praise,
Reaching from Earth to Heaven;
Chosen, redeemed, forgiven,
So lay thy happy head,
Prayer—crown'd—on blessed bed.

THE VIST.

In one of the freezing days of our climate, a young physician but recently married, invited his wife to accompany him on a visit to one of his patients.

'You are romancing, James; what!—visit a family without an introduction or invitation; or exchange of cards?'

'In this family, my dear Amanda, there is no ceremony of cards,' said James, 'but they will not be less pleased to see you.'

'I never used to go to see poor people,' said Amanda thoughtfully; 'but,' continued she after a short deliberation, 'I'll go with you any where.'

They passed from the handsome street of their residence to a public square, and crossing over entered a small alley, in which Amanda saw a row of houses built in a manner that showed they were for the laboring class. Crossing the whole range they entered the last house, and the first door Dr. Ledson gave a gentle rap. A plain woman opened it, and welcomed them.

Two chairs were immediately set out, one with the back broken off, the other rickety and unstable.

Before the fire were two little children seated on the hearth, making a noise which the attendant female vainly endeavored to quell. A girl about ten years of age came out of a small pantry bed-room, and smiled as she spoke.

In a large rude chair sat a thin female. She rocked herself incessantly. She looked up when Dr. Ledson addressed her, but neither smiled or spoke. Her complexion was sallow by illness, her lower jaw had fallen from its socket, and her teeth chattered with the vain endeavor to close her mouth.

At receiving some nourishment at the hand of her companion she seemed revived.

'I am glad to see you, doctor, though I half-hoped to have been released from my wretchedness before now. I do not complain, but my bones have started through the skin, and I suffer,'—she shivered and stopped an instant. 'I thought it very hard when I lost my baby last summer; I see it was kind; what would have become of it now? I must leave these, young as they are, to take care of themselves, and my husband is none of the steadiest.'

She did not weep; she was past that human feeling. Amanda looked on in silence. She had learned more of life's state from this scene than she could have acquired from volumes.—She felt now a wiser woman at eighteen, than she would otherwise have been at thirty-five.

It brings down all our vanities and little repinings—a spectacle of such woe. Even the almost insensibility of the sick, was more touching than ordinary sorrow. It gave a feeling of so much that must have been endured before.

'Is this your sister?' said the woman.

'No,' said James, and Amanda smiled as he replied, 'It is my wife.'

'Is it your wife!' said she, showing some vivacity. 'How sweet she looks. Can she sing, O, can she sing, 'I would not live always?'

How often had Amanda sung that carelessly before. She felt awed and humbled now by every syllable that floated on her soft rich tones around the narrow apartment.

The dying looked up so thankfully, that she even looked pretty. A light hectic relieved her vivid countenance. She said audibly, 'I hear the angels singing around me,' and then relapsed into a monotonous groan of weariness.

The little girl shook hands beseechingly as the young couple left, and in a subdued voice Amanda whispered, 'We will take care of you.'

Who like the physician, save indeed the minister, is called upon to see human nature in every shadow of a tint? The rich and the poor, the delicate and the coarse, the learned and the ignorant come before him without disguise.

Amanda thought before, that she loved her husband; but luxury is a dead sea atmosphere, in which the noblest passions sicken and lie motionless. She clung to James' arm as he returned home with a feeling of devotion to him, that she had never imagined before; and in the pleasure she experienced in softening the horrors of her fellow creatures' poverty, she found every day new cause to rejoice in having shared her fortune with one who, if he brought her no addition of the earth's wealth, had taught her that there is a way of employing it that will awaken delight.

THE JEWS.

A writer in Blackwood, in the course of an eloquent article on the Jews and Jerusalem, states that the population of Judea, in its most palmy days, did not exceed 4,000,000. The numbers who entered Palestine from the wilderness were evidently not much more than three; and their census, according to the German statistics, who are generally considered to be correct, is now nearly the same as that under Moses—about three millions they are thus distributed:

In Europe. 1,916,000, of which about 658,000 are in Poland and Russia, and 453,000 are in Austria.

In Asia, 738,000, of which 300,000 are in Asiatic Turkey.

In Africa, 504,000, of which 300,000 are in Morocco.

In America, North and South, 5,700.

If we add to these about 15,000 Samaritans, the calculations in round numbers will be about 3,180,000.

This was the report in 1825—the numbers probably remain the same.

The writer remarks:

"This extraordinary fixedness in the midst of almost universal increase, is doubtless not without a reason—if we are even to look for it among the mysterious operations which have preserved Israel a separate race through eighteen hundred years. May we not naturally conceive, that a people thus preserved without advance or retrocession; dispersed, yet combined; broken, yet firm; without a country, yet dwellers in all; every where insulted, yet every where influential; without a nation, yet united as no nation ever was before or since—has not been appointed to offer this extraordinary contradiction to the common laws of society, and even the common progress of nature, without a cause, and that cause one of filial benevolence, universal good, and divine grandeur?"

He observes further:

"The remarkable determination of European politics towards Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt, within these few years; the not less unexpected change of manners and customs, which seem to defy all change; and the new life infused into the stagnant governments of Asia, even by their being flung into the whirl of European interests, look not unlike signs of the times. It may be no dream, to imagine in these phenomena the proofs of some memorable change in the interior of things—some preparative for that great providential restoration, of which Jerusalem will yet be the scene, if not the centre; and the Israelite himself the especial agent of those high transactions, which shall make christianity the religion of all lands, restore the dismantled beauty of the earth, and make man, what he was created to be—"only a little lower than the angels."

Power of Association.—Our happiness greatly depends on our forming pleasant associations. We are told that "no people are more national or patriotic than the Scotch," and we honor them for it; for the man that does not love his country, will not be likely to love truly any thing else.—Even the bleak cold hills of Caledonia have a charm for her children; for they are associated in their memory with some noble historic tale, song or legend, learnt in infancy, and clinging round their hearts to the latest period of existence—from the first dawn of childhood, down to the last lingering twilight of old age. The affecting and touching earnestness of Scott, when returning to his native land from Italy—a dying man—and gazing with the fondness of a child upon the misty summits of his much loved, and well remembered hills—even as a child would look languidly and wistfully, in a fond and affectionate mother's face—is one of the most pathetic passages in his whole life. We admire and respect a country that cherishes such feelings, or that possesses any talisman whatever within her boundaries, to draw forth such testimonies of love from her children. —Watchtower.

A good wife exhibits her love for her husband by trying to promote his welfare, and by trying to administer to his comfort.

A poor wife 'dears' and 'my loves' her husband, and would'nt sew a button to his coat to keep him from freezing.

A sensible wife looks for her enjoyment at home—a silly one abroad.

A wise girl would win a lover by practising those virtues which secure admiration when personal charms have faded.

A simple girl endeavors to recommend herself by the exhibition of frivolous accomplishments, and a mawkish sentiment which is as shallow as her mind.

A good girl always possesses the respect of others.

The hatred of the vicious will do you less harm than their conversation.

A New England merchant who had accumulated a vast property by care and industry, yet still was as busy as ever, in adding vessel to vessel and store to store, though considerably advanced in life, being asked by a neighbor how much property he supposed would satisfy a human being, after a short pause replied, 'A little more.'

Money is his servant who knows how to use it as he should; his master who doth not.

A bad agreement is better than a good law suit.

Give neither counsel nor salt till you are asked for it.

The fool never thinks higher than the top of his house.

FOR THE FARMER.

From the Newark Sentinel.

CULTURE OF INDIAN CORN.

Careful observation has satisfied the writer, that the present system of cultivating Indian corn, is generally very defective, and can be greatly improved. Not more than half a crop is obtained upon an average, except on new or very strong land.—We also see this valuable crop frequently destroyed by autumnal frosts.

The following is an outline of the plan which has been tried by the writer, with entire success. Good crops have been obtained—75 bushels to the acre—and the corn invariably ripened before the frosts of autumn could injure it.

Spread upon the ground before ploughing, 20 to 30 ox cart loads of good, long, or unrotted stable manure: when the corn is planted, put into the hill one half of a shovel full of well rotted manure. This will give the corn an early and vigorous growth until the roots are long enough to derive sustenance from the long manure. By thus giving it an earlier start, it will ripen two or three weeks earlier than it otherwise would the long manure will carry it out, and make more corn and less stock, than when all rotted manure is used. Let the manure, which has kept until it has rotted, be piled up and covered up, so as to protect it from rain and sun, and it will lose much less of its strength than when exposed. Some may say, that the quantity recommended per acre, is more than can generally be afforded. Unless the land is very strong, or in high tilth, less cannot be afforded. As a general rule, 5 acres, with 100 loads of manure, will produce more corn than 10 acres with the same quantity, besides the great saving of labor and ground. It is very clear that farmers generally do not manure their land high enough for Indian corn. Upon sward land, rotten manure is indispensable to give the corn a start, and insure an early and full crop.

Poudrette is a good substitute for rotten manure, when it can be had.

No farmer should be satisfied until his average crop is at least 75 bushels to the acre.

TO PREVENT SMUT IN WHEAT.

Messrs Editors—As many farmers are slow to believe in the efficiency of brine and lime in preventing smut in wheat, I am induced to give additional testimony in confirmation.

As our winter wheat is rarely smutty to any extent, we have never prepared that seed by brining and liming. But our Spring wheat having formerly been more or less smutty, we now prepare our seeds in the following manner; after putting our seed into water, to separate the light kernels and oats, if there should be any amongst it, we put into a tub, and pour strong brine, about blood warm, on to it till it is completely covered. After it has steeped three or four hours, we take it out in baskets, in which we let it stand until it is sufficiently drained; then we spread it on a barn floor, and rake in fresh slacked lime until the wheat becomes dry, when it is fit for sowing.

The past two seasons, we have prepared our seed wheat in this way, and not a kernel of smut has been found in the crop raised from it; while our neighbors who neglect this preparation, are generally troubled with smut.

We sow our spring wheat about the first of May. Cassander.

From the Farmers' Monthly Visitor.

To Cure a Sick Cow.—Mr. H. a neighbor of mine, came to my house in January last, and informed me he had a valuable cow that was apparently well in the morning, and when he put her up at night, she would not eat, and for three days, had neither ate, nor drank, nor chewed the cud. Her belly was full and somewhat swollen, and no excrement had passed off; he had given her two strong cathartic portions. I told him I once had a sheep in like condition, and that a lady happened at my house while I was preparing medicine for it, and said the sheep had lost its cud, and if so, to make one of the inner bark of sweet elder scraped fine and mixed with unmelted hog's lard would cure it. I soon made a couple of balls and put them into the sheep's mouth; the sheep chewed and swallowed them, and immediately commenced chewing the cud, and was well. Mr. H. gave his cow a like cud, that evening at 6 o'clock, and found her well in the morning.

Great National Work!

LADIES COMPANION, (established in 1834,) a popular and highly esteemed MAGAZINE OF GENERAL LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS: embellished with Gorgeous and Costly Engravings on Steel, Copper and Wood, the Quarterly Fashions, and also with Fashionable and Popular Music, arranged for the Piano-Forte, Harp and Guitar.

TERMS—$3 a year. Single copies 25 cents.—Office 109 Fulton street, New York.

Mrs. L. H. Sigourney: The editors are happy to communicate the information to their readers, that arrangements have been effected with this talented lady by which she will still continue to be a regular and constant contributor to the 'Ladies Companion.' Her engagements in other quarters will not interfere with that connection with the 'Companion,' which secures to its readers the enjoyment of her beautiful productions.

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes of Boston; Professor Longfellow of Cambridge College, and Mrs. Anna Maria Wells of Boston, will hereafter contribute to the 'Ladies Companion.'

SPLENDID NEW STEEL ENGRAVINGS by our best artists, accompany each number: illustrated by tales and spirited sketches, which will as heretofore, continue to be magnificent and far superior to those published in any cotemporary work in America.

QUARTERLY FASHIONS.

Plates of the prevailing Fashions appear once every three months, viz: December, March, June and September.

The Ladies Companion contains a larger quantity of reading than any other magazine issued in this country, and its subscription price is only three dollars a year. The great combination of talent secured for the coming year will render it unequalled by any other periodical.

THE MUSICAL DEPARTMENT.

This department of the Ladies Companion has ever commanded a large share of attention, and has been looked upon with no little interest by its readers, and more especially the Ladies, whom the publisher is in the highest degree anxious to please.—It will continue to be a subject of more than usual care to him, and to the Professor under whose supervision it is placed, to make that portion of the magazine allotted to Music, more than ever deserving of the countenance of every lover of music.—It has ever been and will continue to be the desire to have all pieces of Music printed correctly and free from errors.

Over every department an equally careful supervision will be strictly exercised by the Editors, and all appropriate expenditures will be liberally bestowed, as it is the design of the publisher, with the aid of his contributors and the advice of his friends to make the Ladies Companion distinguished for beauty and accuracy of its typography—the variety and high tone of its literary articles—and the unequalled splendor of its pictoral Embellishments, which are entirely new and engraved by A. Dick, expressly for the work.

It is the determination of the publisher to use every means to maintain the superiority which the Ladies Companion has obtained. For four years he has steadily pursued a course of improvement, and he flatters himself that his present facilities are such as to give the Ladies Companion eminent advantages over all other publications of its character.

From the foregoing it will be perceived that the Ladies Companion embraces every department within the range of Belles Letters and the Fine Arts; and no exertion or expense will be deemed too great to render the work equal to any other extant. The flattering and general testimonials of nearly every contemporary journal in the United States, and in fact many on the other side of the Atlantic, have strongly asserted the undeniable claims of the Ladies Companion to the support of the public generally. There is no work that gives its readers such a great return for their subscriptions.

TERMS.—$3 a year in advance, or $4 during the year. No subscription received for less than one year.

Complete sets of the volume from May, 1839, can be furnished at the subscription price by applying at the office. All letters must be addressed, post paid, to WILLIAM W. SNOWDEN, 109 Fulton street, N. Y.

Illustrations of Prophecy.

BY DAVID CAMPBELL.
No. 9, Washington Street, Boston.

THIS work of above 400 pages 18 mo. just published, embraces many of the views of distinguished writers on the prophecies of Daniel and John, together with some of no small value, found in no other work. It is prepared as the reader will see, with unusual advantages of imparting to the eye the resemblance of the natural emblems used by the prophets. These will interest many of the young, especially to investigate the prophecies, which they have hitherto regarded as a sealed book; and, with the geography of the prophecies, and chronological calculations peculiar to this work; it will afford much help to understand these parts of the Bible.—It also shows the erroneous ground of some modern propagators of an old but startling theory, that the 'end of all things is at hand.' Should the reader fail to find that fulness desirable, yet from so brief a dissertation, he will find much to gratify and instruct. It is a work demanded by the present exigency of the public mind, and is written with a good spirit, giving sober common sense views on matters of great interest.

The work contains 150 pictoral illustrations colored according to the description of the prophets: price $1.00. An Appendix in form of an Atlas, is prepared to accompany the work, which gives a view of countries, in which predicated events have taken place, and which are to take place; also large diagrams and chronological tables, entirely original in their arrangements. One of these plates, throws the entire chronology of the apocalypse upon one square, to page with the seals, trumpets, and vials arranged in the most skilful manner exhibiting symmetry and beauty, as well as harmony of numbers.

☞Editors who insert the above notice, will be entitled to a copy of the work and atlas, by ordering them from No. 9 Washington street, Boston; 126 Fulton street, New-York.

THE ORPHAN.

In one of the beautiful villages situated in Western New York, a family not long since resided, consisting of three in number; the father and mother, and a beautiful daughter. They had found their way across the wide Atlantic to this land of freedom to seek an asylum far from the hand of the oppressor. They were strictly Roman Catholics in sentiment, and strove with assiduity to instil their pernicious principles into the mind of their only child; and their efforts hitherto had proved successful. She had arrived at the age of fifteen, and had never read the Word of God, or even seen a Bible; but the chains that bound her were to be loosened. She was sent to a Protestant school, kept in the village where she resided, and by mingling in the society of others, she learned something about those truths of which before she had but a faint idea. Being of an inquisitive mind, she watched every opportunity for gaining information; previous to this time, however, she had often doubted the truth of her own religion.

One day, during the intermission, she took up a book and began to read; it was a Testament. She read about Jesus Christ; and that we must confess our sins to Him, and worship Him "in spirit and in truth;" and when she came into the presence of the priest again to confess her sins, she felt that it was degrading to human nature to bow the knee to a created being like herself. She made some remarks on the subject, for which he made her perform some light penance for her unbelief, and patted her cheek and said, that "he should have to send her to the convent in Montreal to finish her education." This was the design of her parents, and she had ever been pleased with the idea; but now it seemed unpleasant to her, for not long before she had read a book entitled "Six Months in a Convent," and she feared her fate would be even worse than death.

We seldom glide along the stream of time uninterruptedly without something to mar our happiness, and thwart the plans which we have laid to pursue. It was thus with the family to which our heroine belonged, whose name I shall call Caroline. She had never known sorrow; her spirit was as buoyant and free as the air she breathed. But, alas! her cup of bitterness was almost filled, and she was about to drink of it even to the dregs. Sickness enters her dwelling, and her mother was thrown upon a bed of languishing. Consumption, that slow disease, but sure, seated on her vitals. Day after day Caroline watched beside her couch, and ministered to her necessities, and heeded little else that was passing around her. But the kind attentions of a dutiful child, and the skill of eminent physicians could not stop the ravages of disease. The hectic flush, which glowed on her cheek, told that she was fast hastening to the tomb. The mother was sensible that she must soon go the way of all the earth, and only regretted that she must leave her child in a strange land, far from her kindred and the land of her nativity. She said she was not afraid to die—that her faith was strong in the doctrines she professed, and expected to be saved through the intercession of saints.—She did not depend upon the merits of Jesus Christ alone for salvation, and therefore could experience none of the consolations which are offered in the gospel. No ray of light irradiated the passage through the "valley and shadow of death!" All was dark and cheerless. The priest visited the sick-room daily, and performed the ceremony of anointing the body of the sufferer.—Tapers were kept burning nightly in the apartment, which gave to the scene an unearthly appearance, and was well calculated to fill the mind of a young and timid girl with horror. Caroline felt that her heart was truly desolate, and that she needed something more than an earthly arm to lean upon. Where now could she find a mother's tenderness! and to whom could she unbosom her sorrows with such perfect confidence and feelings of security!—A dark cloud hung o'er her future prospects—sometimes some of the words she had read in the Testament stole into her mind, such as "Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest," yea, rest unto your souls. She ardently desired to find some one to direct her; but dare not make known her feelings to a fellow being.

The mother continued to waste away gradually under the influence of disease.—The lamp of life was flickering in its socket, and the deathless spirit seemed unwilling to leave its frail tenement, and enter upon the untried realities of another world. But the messenger of death at length arrives and performs his work—there is no delay when GOD requireth the soul.—The following day the priest performed the funeral services, and the night that preceded, prayed that the soul of the deceased might not suffer the pains of purgatory, but be admitted into Paradise, and roam free in its elysian fields. Caroline and her father truly felt that their "house was left to them desolate." The voice that had so often welcomed them after absence was now hushed in death—and would never again be heard in tones of sympathy.

Caroline remained for a time inconsolable, but as time wore away she became more reconciled to her loss; she knew that she lived for another beside herself—that she had a parent left who needed her society, and that it was her duty to do every thing in her power to render his life comfortable.

It is said by a certain writer that "time will blunt the edge of keenest sorrow"—and certainly it does in most cases. The wounds which had been made in Caroline's bosom were healed in some degree; she being of a volatile disposition she sought to assuage her grief and drown her serious impressions by mingling in the society of the gay and fashionable. She was often seen amid the joyous throng, and her heart beat quick at the sound of the viol, and she hastened to join in the mazy dance—but there were times when feelings of sadness came o'er her spirit as well when in festive hall as when lone and solitary, and she was reminded that the pleasures in which she delighted were evanescent, and she often heard a "still small voice" whispering in her ear the words of our Savior,—"Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh." At times she was inclined to listen to the heavenly monitor; but the phantom-pleasure would again beguile her, and she would say, like Felix, "Go thy way for this time, and when I have a more convenient season I will call for thee." Could the veil which hides the future have been drawn aside, or her fate been made known to her by some prophetic pen, she would have turned with disgust from all so "seeming fair," and the facinations of pleasure would have ceased to charm. But that God who orders all events in just such a manner as He sees fit, sent her calamities in an unexpected hour.—The sun, which arose in all his splendor and shed his effulgent beams upon her, ere his setting rays gilded the mountain tops, she was a most wretched being. Her father was seized with sudden illness, which baffled the Physician's skill, and in a few hours he was a lifeless corpse. His sufferings were so intense that he could not even bestow a parting blessing on his child—he could only clasp her hand in his and say—"Farewell!" The struggle betwixt life and death was hard—but it was soon over. The destroying angel executed his commission, and Death stamped that countenance with livid paleness, which a little time before indicated nought to the eye of the beholder, but that the possessor might enjoy long life.

The same ceremonies were performed that were at her mother's burial; but, alas! her condition was very different. That father, on whose arm she had leaned, and whose tenderness mitigated the poignancy of her grief, was now no more. Where now could she find a human being that would shed the tear of commiseration over her misery! Where now could she find a protector that would shield her from the insults of a cold and unfeeling world!—Ah! she well knew into whose hands she would fall—the priest had given her intimations of his designs concerning her, and this was what she dreaded. It was soon settled that she should go and reside with the priest, and that he should take care of her temporal affairs, and have the disposal of her property.

It was mid-summer when she was about to leave her once loved home. The flowers which she had reared would shed their fragrance to the evening breeze, and bloom fresh to delight and regale the senses of another; but she regretted it not, for all that made life to her desirable, and that home a place of happiness, had passed beyond the bounds of time.

"And she was left a lonely orphan'd one;
For, like a twig, torn from its parent stem,
And cast upon the roughly heaving wave,
The wanton sport of each inconstant gale,
So was she thrown upon life's dark boist'rous seas.
Scarce the wild rapturous burst of youthful glee
Broke from her joyous lips ere it was changed
For the low, moaning, chilling tones of grief."

As soon as practicable Caroline left her former home, and arrived at her new place of residence where she found every thing fitted up for her accommodation, and surrounded by the luxuries of life. But the blandishments of wealth had lost their power to charm. The family with whom she boarded were unwearied in their exertions to minister to her necessities, and soothe the anguish of her mind. But her wounds were now too deep for any earthly remedies. Every day she was obliged to attend to the formalities of her religion.—Her actions were strictly watched, and she was not permitted to mingle in the society of any but Roman Catholics, which to her was a great privation. She saw every day more of the hypocrisy of the priesthood, and desired to get away from the thralldom in which she was bound.

Spring had again returned, and spread its green foliage over the decayed face of nature—vegetation was starting into life in all its varied hues and forms, from the towering monarch of the forest to the lowliest flower that decks the fields. Time passed away rapidly, yet the days and hours seemed long to Caroline. She knew that she must have some employment to interest her and arouse and quicken the sleeping energies of her mind. She had for some time wished to ask permission of the priest to attend school, but feared to lest he should send her to some place where she would not like to go. She ventured, however, to make known to him her wishes. He told her that he had been thinking that it was best to send her to some convent where there was a school kept, and had consulted some of his friends on the subject. For some time she made him no reply; at length she asked him if he would not permit her to go to what school she pleased; he made her no answer, but left the room abruptly. She saw plainly that she must comply with his wishes or be treated harshly. She knew not what to do, but concluded that she would never enter within the walls of a convent.

A few days after the conversation with the priest he entered her apartment again, and asked her if she had concluded to go to Montreal to school, and spoke of the benefits that would arise to herself provided she would go. She told him plainly that she would prefer to stay at home.—He seemed much displeased, and left her to indulge in her own gloomy reflections.—Not long after this last conversation a number of priests visited the one with whom she resided. She was left alone during the day, and at night sat up much later than usual. When she retired to her chamber to rest, she had to pass by the room where the priests were in conversation; the door was left ajar and she heard her name mentioned, she stopped and listened for a moment. She heard one of them say that if she was not willing to go they would take her by force; another answered that they would invite her to take a ride into the country. This was enough. She hurried to her own apartment, and tried to compose her mind that she might consider what course to pursue. She knew that it was in vain to indulge in useless grief, and therefore she called to her aid all the fortitude she was master of, and concluded that she would tell the priest that she was willing to comply with his wishes, and appear as cheerful as possible when in his presence, and pretend to make preparations for her departure. When she met the priest again she tried to appear as though nothing had happened, and told him that she had tho't much of what he had said respecting her going to school, and that she presumed that he knew what was best for her, and therefore would go where he might be pleased to send her. He seemed satisfied with what she had said, and in a few days he gave her permission to go to a neighboring village, in order to purchase some articles of clothing. She went accompanied only by a servant. When she arrived at her place of destination, she told the servant that she should not be ready to return until late in the afternoon. She went immediately to the hotel; the stage-coach was just ready to start; she procured a seat, and in a few moments was conveyed rapidly forward. Her mind was so agitated that she had no time for reflection. She knew not the place of her destination.—She only knew that she was going in a direction far away from those beings whom she feared. She felt that she was a "lone wanderer," without a friend to direct what "snares to shun or what path pursue."—Her fellow passengers were courteous and treated her with marked attention. But their kindness could not allay the feverish excitement of her mind. The third day after she had eloped, when the coach halted for the passengers to dine, she was so exhausted in body and mind that she could take no refreshment. She seated herself by the window, and was musing on her forlorn condition, when she was aroused from her reverie by the sound of carriage wheels. She started with sudden fear—looked out of the window and a carriage stood by the door—a gentleman and lady had alighted. The lady was handed into the room where Caroline was sitting, and as she cast her eye upon her, she thought she had seen that countenance before.—She looked again—they met each other's glance.—It was a look of recognition.—Yes, truly, they had met before. It was a school mate of her happier days! An explanation took place. The reader may imagine the scene that followed. Oh! if there is a period in the existence of mortals when we forget the ills that throng us round, it is when helpless and overwhelmed with grief we find unexpected relief, and can pour the pent up sorrows of the heart, without restraint, into the bosom of a faithful friend, "and tears have room to flow."

"Oh! is there aught can heal the spirit's wounds
When the lone heart is strip'd of all it'cherished dear?
Ah! thou alone who wondrous framed that heart,
Who knows each spring of joy—each fount
Of anguish knows—yes, He can heal its wounds.
His searching eye ne'er sleeps, and nought escapes
Its piercing view. He watched the orphan's steps.
He left her o'er the world to roam, to sip
At pleasure's honied cup, and sought to quell
Immortal thirst—to drink its bitter dregs."

After Caroline had told her friend her misfortunes, she wiped away her tears and at her request accompanied her to the residence of her parents, who gave her a cordial reception. They were distinguished for their philanthropy and benevolence, and their house was the ORPHAN'S home; and I trust their "names will be had in everlasting remembrance."

A few weeks after Caroline had found a refuge, the Roman Catholic priest and some of his followers arrived at the same place and tried every means to get her into their power—but her interesting history had gathered friends around her that would protect her from the wiles and malice of the Roman Catholic priesthood. She now thought seriously about the salvation of her soul, and that she was a sinner in the sight of God. She went into the sanctuary and there she learned the end of the wicked. The Psalmist says "I went into the sanctuary of God; then I understood their end. Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down to destruction." Caroline sought and found "the pearl of great price," and united herself to the church of Christ.

* * * * Years passed by,—a gentleman distinguished for his learning, piety and talents, who resided in the village where Caroline found a home, was traveling through her native village, and met a friend of his. During the conversation, his friend inquired after the "orphan girl;" he had never heard the particulars of her history, but learned them of his friends, and felt strangely interested in her welfare, and when he returned home he sought out the fugitive—they met! There are beings whose souls are assimilated, and who only need to become acquainted with each other and their hearts will beat in unison. It was thus with the stranger and the "orphan girl." She appeared to him to be just such a being as he had pictured in his imagination as one whom he could love. Sorrow had tinged her intelligent countenance with a look of melancholy—but now it was animated with the Christian's hope. Some of those passions which play around the heart, but had lain dormant in the bosom of Caroline, were brought into action by the kindness of the benevolent stranger; and, at his solicitation, she gave him her hand.

There may be seen in a delightful part of the country a beautiful and commodious cottage—white as the driven snow—noted by the traveler for the natural and artificial beauties with which it is surrounded, and for the commanding view which is had from its site of the picturesque scenery that is seen in the distance; and the simple decorations without exhibit the good taste of its inmates. The beloved and happy wife of the proprietor of that mansion has not forgotten the hour when in the last extremity of her sorrow, she sat by the window of the hotel, musing over her sad fate and doubting the goodness of that Being who sustained her, when she was startled by the noise of carriage-wheels, and the impulse of the moment was that her enemies had pursued her—but lo! it was a friend. And she now recognizes that Being who watched over her through all the intricate windings of her path and who has ultimately made her the happy recipient of such inestimable blessings. S. G.

THE CHRISTIAN'S LOVE FOR THE HOUSE OF GOD.

Mr. H——— had been for several years in feeble health, having in his own view, though not in the opinion of his physician, indubitable symptoms of pulmonary disease. For some months before his decease, he was confined almost entirely to his house; consequently was denied the privilege, invaluable to him, of attending public worship. A few weeks before he died, he said to his wife, "If I live till next Sabbath, I must go to meeting once more." She replied that he might be unable to endure the exertion. Said he, "I cannot be denied the pleasure of visiting the sanctuary once more, if it be possible for me to get there." Mrs. H——— who tenderly sympathized with him in love for the sanctuary, said no more. When the Sabbath came, he requested her to make him ready for meeting.—Aware that he could not endure the fatigue of riding from home and attending meeting the same half day, he rode during the morning service to my house, situated but a few rods from the meeting-house, where he sought some repose. Here I found him on my return from the morning service.—He said, as I entered the room, in a tone which betokened the depth of his emotions, "I am come once more to attend meeting before I die." In the afternoon, "we walked to the house of God in company." During the service, the deep solemnity of his aspect, not less than his extreme debility, attracted the attention of those around him. At the close of the service, after the congregation had mostly retired, I noticed him standing near one of the doors, and surveying the interior of the house with great deliberation. After he come out, he took a similar survey of its exterior, and of the adjacent grounds. I was affected by the proceeding, but knew not how to explain it, though I suspected its meaning. Next morning I called upon him, and after a few remarks about his feelings, he said, "I had great enjoyment yesterday at meeting, and before I left, I took a final leave of the pulpit, and the walls, and the seats. I never expect to enter the sacred place again, but I thank God for the opportunity afforded me yesterday; and I shall thank him, even though the effort should hasten my departure."

Whether he was unfavorably affected or not by his exertion, from this time he failed rapidly, manifesting however, cheerful submission, and unwavering confidence in his Redeemer; and in about five weeks, exchanged, as we trust, hope for fruition, and earthly for heavenly worship, in concert with saints and seraphim.

"How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord: my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God.—A day in thy courts is better than a thousand.—I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness."—Pastor's Journal.

GOD SEEN IN HIS WORKS

TALE FROM THE GERMAN.

In that beautiful part of Germany which borders on the Rhine, there is a noble castle, which, as you travel on the western banks of the river, you may see lifting its ancient towers on the opposite side, above the grove of trees about as old as itself.—About forty years ago, there lived in that castle, a noble gentleman, whom we call Baron ——. The baron had only one son, who was not only a comfort to his father, but a blessing to all who lived on his father's land.

It happened, on a certain occasion, that this young man being from home, there came a French gentleman to see the baron. As soon as this gentleman came into the castle, he began to talk of his Heavenly Father in terms that chilled the old man's blood; on which the baron reproved him, saying, 'Are you not afraid of offending God who reigns above, by speaking in such a manner?'

The gentlemen said that he knew nothing about God, for he had never seen him.

The baron did not notice at this time what the gentleman said, but the next morning took him about his castle and ground, and took occasion first to show him a very beautiful picture that hung on the wall.

The gentleman admired the picture very much; and said, 'Whoever drew this picture, knows very well how to use his pencil.'

'My son drew that picture,' said the baron.

'Then your son is a very clever man,' replied the gentleman.

The baron then went with his visitor into the garden, and showed him many beautiful flowers and plantations of forest trees.

'Who has the ordering of this garden?' asked the gentleman.

'My son,' replied the baron; 'he knows every plant, I may say, from the cedar of Lebanon to the hyssop on the wall.'

'Indeed,' said the gentleman, 'I shall think very highly of him soon.'

The baron then took him into the village, and showed him a small neat cottage, where his son had established a school, and where he caused all young children who had lost their parents, to be relieved and nourished at his own expense.

The children in the house looked so innocent and so happy, that the gentleman was very much pleased, and when he returned to the castle, he said to the baron, 'what a happy man you are to have so good a son.'

'How do you know I have so good a son?'

'Because I have seen his works, and I know that he must be both good and clever if he has done all you have shown me.'

'But you have never seen him.'

'No, but I know him very well, because I judge of him by his works.'

'You do! and now please to draw near this window, and tell me what you observe.'

'Why I see the sun traveling through the sky, and shedding its glories over one of the finest countries in the world, and I behold a mighty river at my feet, and a vast range of woods. I see pasture grounds, and orchards, and vineyards; and cattle and sheep feeding in green fields; and many thatched cottages scattered here and there.'

'And do you see any thing to be admired in all this? Is there any thing pleasant, or lovely, or cheerful in all that is spread before you?'

'Do you think I want common sense?—or that I have lost the use of my eyes, my friend?' said the gentleman, somewhat angrily, 'that I should not be able to relish the charms of such a scene as this?'

'Well, then,' said the baron, 'if you are able to judge of my son's good character by seeing his good works, which are poor and imperfect, how does it happen that you form no judgment of the goodness of God, by witnessing such wonders of his handy works as are now before you? Let me never hear you, my good friend, again say that you know not God, unless you would have me suppose that you have lost the use of your senses.'

ENQUIRY.—The spirit of enquiry is a noble spirit, and the more so, as our enquiries are directed to subjects glorious and sublime. To know and understand our being, end, and aim, is, or should be, the great purpose of life. Man's most degraded enquiries into that which is uppermost in his mind, and no exertions spared to accumulate that for which he practically lives and labors; groveling through life with no other object, but to gratify his sensual appetite; he experiences in the worst sense "how little man can know." But the man who is desirous of becoming what he ought to be, wiser and better, will find on wisdom's road many who will and can give him profitable advice on enquiry. No man should be ashamed to enquire when he knows he is lost, when others are at hand who know the way, and understand the best method of traveling on that way which we purpose to pursue.—In all cases we should enquire of those who are most fitted to give us information and best understand the subject to which our enquiries are directed. All will acknowledge the truth of this proposition in temporal affairs, how much more will it apply to things sacred and profound? Religious Enquiry has long agitated the Christian world, and great and glorious has been the result. Many have found the truth as it is made plain in the Old and New Testament; and the great reason why more have not found it, is, that they have enquired of man, instead of the Lord.—They have slaked their thirst for truth, from the stream, instead of the fountain—consequently they have sucked in much error and delusion, that has floated down the stream, incorporated and commingled since it originated from the fountain.

The enquirer must go to him who is the "way, the truth, and the life," the only source of light and knowledge. If any man lack wisdom let him ask of God who giveth to all men liberally, and who has no respect to persons—but in every nation they who fear him and work righteousness are every where accepted of him. J. A.

A DEIST.—A correspondent of the Christian Observer says, "Some years ago, I occasionally met with a disciple of the late Dr. Darwin, he had drank so deeply into the system and spirit of his master, as to consider him the very first philosopher of the age. I have heard him expatiate with enthusiasm on his writings and character, and revile the holy Scripture with all the rant of vulgar blasphemy. A few months after my last interview with Mr. ———, I was informed that he was no more. Struck with the event, I was solicitous to know how he died. The account I received was, that as death approached, the confidence he had before expressed in his deistical opinions forsook him, and deep horror seized his mind. A short time before his departure, supposing himself alone, he was overheard by an unobserved attendant giving vent to the agonies of a tortured conscience. With furious despair he expostulated with Dr. Darwin, whom he now reproached as his deceiver; and after loading his name with execrations, which I dare not put to paper, he closed the horrid remonstrance in some such terms as the following: 'Monster! wretch! Is this the end of your boasted philosophy! Have you brought me to this!'"

Conscience is that something within us, which approves when we do right, and rebukes when we do wrong.

POWER OF PARENTAL FAITH.

A Clergyman, some time since, concluding a sermon to youth, took occasion to press upon parents the duty of parental faith, and illustrated its power in the following manner:

"About two and twenty years ago, a little circle were met around the apparently dying couch of a male infant; the man of God who led their devotions, seemed to forget the sickness of the child, in his prayer for his future usefulness. He prayed for the child, who had been consecrated to God, at his birth, as a man, a Christian, and a minister of the Word. The parents laid hold of the horns of the altar, and prayed with him. The child recovered, grew towards manhood, ran far in the ways of folly and sin. One after another of that little circle ascended to heaven; but two at least, and one of them the mother, lived to hear him proclaim the everlasting gospel. It is,' said the preacher, "no fiction; that child, that prodigal youth, that preacher, is he who now addresses you.—N. Y. Evangelist 1833.

GOING TO CHURCH.

'What is the use,' said a pupil of a medical friend of ours one morning to his master, on their way to a place of worship, 'what is the use of going to church, when you only hear the same thing over again?'

'What is the use,' replied his master, 'of breakfasting, dining and supping every day, when you only eat the same things over again?'

'I do not see,' said the youth, "as the cases at all resemble each other. I must eat to support my life, and nourish my body, which otherwise would languish and die.'

'The cases are more parallel than you are aware,' rejoined the master. 'What food is to the body, the ordinances of religion are to the soul. As the natural life in the one will languish and decay, unless we maintain it by the bounties of God's providence, so the divine life in the other will wither and decay, unless our passions be regulated by the influence of grace.'

'How does it happen then,' inquired the young man, "that all have not the same relish and religious exercises, while all have the same appetite for their bodily food?'

'There,' answered the master, 'you again mistake the matter. It is very true, that if our bodies are in health, we desire and relish our daily bread; but when we are sick it is widely different: we have then not only no relish for our food, but even loathe it, and not unfrequently desire that which is unnatural and injurious. So it is with the soul. When that is at peace with God, through the redemption which is in Christ, it is in health; and not only desires, but relishes these exercises of devotion, and cannot exist without them; but while the soul continues in sin, it is in a state of disease, and having no appetite for spiritual food, it dislikes both the seasons and the exercises of devotion, and avoids the society of his people. Nor does the resemblance stop even here: for as bodily diseases, unless removed by the hand of skill, will speedily terminate our present existence; so the continuance of the spiritual disease, I mean sin, which we derive from our first parents, will issue in that spiritual and eternal death which consists in that everlasting exclusion of the soul from the presence and favor of its all-wise Creator.

SENSUALITY THE GROUND OF UNBELIEF.

Now the sensual man is, of all men living, the most improper for inquiries after truth, and the least at leisure for it. He is sedate and cool, and therefore not able to fix his attention to a point, and go through with it. He is never disinterested and impartial; and therefore, not capable of deliberating freely. He is already under the dominion and power of his own lusts, and perhaps likes to be so, and is very unwilling to shake off his chains. Now such a man, so disqualified, is no doubt a very incompetent judge of divine truth, and very unfit to consider the pleas that are brought for it. His search into these things is like to be with no great evenness and fairness. How can it, when it comes with strong wishes that he may find it all a mistake?—Indeed, when a man allows himself in all sorts of impurities, and is determined to go on in them, he finds himself under the troublesome restraint of principles, and the dread of religion, which hangs continually over him, the only way for him to pursue his enjoyment, and yet be easy, is to set his face directly against the doctrines of religion, that give him any check or disturbance, and resolve to get rid of them as soon as he can. And he may put the thoughts which rise in him upon this occasion, together, and make a book of them if he pleases; and then tell us that this is a sober inquiry after truth, and a free discussion of a point in debate; but there is nothing of that in it. He thinks of truth just as a man doth of his enemy, with spite and anger, and a design only of finding out what may blast and expose it. This is a strange, contumelious way of treating divine things, and would tempt even a good man to return the affronts due to piety and virtue, by opening the characters of those who do them; in which we should commonly find, that sensuality and looseness of life had a very great and particular share. But some men who write pretended histories of religion, are beholden to the real religion of others, that their histories are not written.—Bishop Atterbury.

The devout Christian, whom in perilous times, and towards the close of life, a gracious Providence has thrown ashore in some sequestered corner, from whence he views those peculiar tumults with which he hath no farther concern, is, perhaps, arrived at the next degree of happiness to that of just spirits made perfect.—Bishop Horne.

A faithful child of God will be prompt to perform any duty, simply, because the Lord enjoins it.

THE REGISTER.

Mr. GEORGE P. MAXSON is a traveling agent for this paper.

AS A MAN THINKETH IN HIS HEART SO IS HE.

That this saying of Solomon is by some persons misunderstood, is evident from the wrong exposition frequently given of it.—We often hear it so expounded as to justify a person in the belief of any doctrine, providing he is sincere. These latitudinarians appear to think if a man is sincere in his sentiments, [no matter what those sentiments are,] he should be acquitted from all blame, justified and saved; 'for, as a man thinketh in his heart so is he'—that is, he is right. If this be true, then Paul was not to blame, and ought to be justified in persecuting the church of Christ, for he did it in all good conscience, and verily thought that he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth. And the Jews are not to blame, and ought to be justified in rejecting Christ, for they are undoubtedly sincere in the belief that they ought not receive him; and who indeed may not be acquitted of blame, and consequently justified and saved, if the above exposition be correct. Such a sentiment strikes at the foundation of all truth, of justice, and of right—overturns the whole fabrick of moral obligations, and throws wide open the flood-gates of error, and if the sentiment should be generally believed and carried out it would deluge the world with the most loathsome and soul-polluting corruptions. This sentiment leaves frail, erring man like a ship at sea in a starless night without a rudder, compass, or chart, driven by fierce winds, and drifting about until dashed upon unseen rocks it is lost forever. It leaves man to believe what he chooses, and to renounce what he dislikes—in short to follow out the leading propensities of his nature on what is vainly supposed to be justifiable grounds; whereas we are required to believe the scriptures; to know the truth; and we can only be right, as we think, believe, and do right. The passage under consideration means just what it says—'As a man thinketh in his heart so is he,' that is, whatever may be a man's conduct, appearance or profession, his character is determined by the thoughts and sentiments of his heart. Nothing is more evident than that this is the true meaning of the text.—'Eat not thou,' says Solomon, the 'bread of him that hath an evil eye; neither desire thou his dainty meat: for as a man thinketh in his heart so is he; eat and drink saith he to thee, but his heart is not with thee.' The meaning is, covetous men, notwithstanding, to save appearance, at some times may appear to be liberal; yet they are covetous still, and will grudge to part with what they may seem willing to give.—The passage thus explained harmonizes with the whole tenure of the scriptures, while it fixes upon man the obligation to listen to the voice of truth, and to incline his heart to obey the laws of righteousness.

CONVERSION.—During the recent revival in Pulaski, N. Y., a tavern keeper by the name of Lynch, under a solemn conviction of the sin of selling intoxicating drinks, came out a thorough temperance man—discontinued the traffic, and since declares his determination never to resume it, let the consequences be what they may. Mr. Lynch keeps good accommodations, and is reasonable in his charges. We hope such houses will be patronized by temperance men, and that their devotion to right principles will be no disadvantage to them even in a pecuniary sense. Those are not the most consistent men who advocate temperance principles at home, and evince little or no interest in sustaining them abroad.

By a letter just received from Rev. Job Tyler, we learn that a gracious revival of religion has been experienced in Centreville, St. Josephs co., Michigan, within a short time past. The number of converts not stated. The prospects are said to be very flattering in that vicinity. Brother Tyler makes a strong appeal in behalf of destitute societies in Michigan for missionary aid. He thinks much good might result from the employment of an efficient laborer in that state. Similar requests reach us from Wisconsin, Indiana, Ohio, and other places. We hope it will be in the power of the Executive Committee of the Missionary Society to answer these Macedonian calls.

Brother Tyler further says that a number of persons have lately embraced the Bible Sabbath in that vicinity, and that the question relative to the requirements of the fourth commandment is considerably agitated. He sends us the names of four subscribers for the Register, and promises to obtain more soon. Will not other ministers go and do likewise?

"PRACTICAL ELOCUTION," by Professor S. N. Sweet.—This work which was recently put into our hands appears, from the partial attention we have been able to give it, to be a highly useful work, and well adapted to secure the important purposes for which it is designed. It is accompanied with the best of recommendations from several highly distinguished gentlemen in this state. This, together with the fact that Mr. Sweet is extensively known as a popular lecturer and teacher of Elocution, entitles the work to the consideration of those who wish to acquire a knowledge of the principles upon which good reading and speaking are founded.

Mr. Sweet is now giving a course of ten practical lessons on Elocution in the De Ruyter Institute, which promise here, as elsewhere, to have a highly beneficial effect upon the young gentlemen who belong to the class.

NEW PAPER.—We have received the first number of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Reporter, published at New York. It is to be the organ of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society; whose objects are 'the extinction of slavery, and the slave trade, and the equal security, protection, and improvement of the people of color.' The number before us breathes a mild and good spirit, and is neatly executed. Terms $1, for a volume of 24 numbers to single subscribers. Ten copies to one direction $5. Payment always in advance.

UNION.—The "Olive Leaf," published at Providence, R. I., and the "New York Weekly Messenger," have been united under the supervision of Mr. L. D. Johnson. Judging from the former character of the papers thus united we expect a valuable paper. We wish the publisher success.

The Eastern Seventh-day Baptist Association convened at the meeting house of the first church in Hopkinton, R. I., on the 22d ultimo. Rev. Daniel Coon was chosen moderator, and brethren Joseph Potter, and C. C. Lewis, secretaries. Their circular letter is on the subject of union among christians.

In a communication from Mr. J. Sutten, of Smyrna, we are informed that there is a society of Seventh-day Baptists in the vicinity of Mount Pleasant, Maury co., Tennessee. We send this week a few copies of our paper to that place, and respectfully request the Post Master to act as agent in obtaining subscribers in that neighborhood.

☞ To those subscribers who wished the back numbers of the Register we are obliged to say, that we are unable to furnish one of the 13th No. We work off, however, a sufficient number this week to meet the increase of our subscription list for the present, which, we are happy to say has been very rapid of late.

Cheap, Cheap enough.

☞ Good Board can be obtained at the Boarding House of the De Ruyter Institute, for $1,25 per week. Who is to blame if children are not well educated when such facilities are offered?

ENLARGEMENT.—The "Republican & Eagle," published at Cortland and Homer villages by Rufus A. Reed, has been enlarged and very much improved. It now assumes the name of the Cortland County Whig.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The following communication is from a young Jewess in the Island of St. Croix to sister S——, who passed the winter there. Our sister had been informed that Miss B——, the writer, had become a disciple of Jesus—and being anxious to obtain an acquaintance with her, called upon her; but not finding her at home—and being about to leave the Island—she wrote on the blank side of one of the tracts upon "the prophetic character of the Messiah," and left it for her—and since her return to New York has received a letter of which the following is an extract. Being favored with the perusal of it; I have, with the permission of sister S—— transcribed it for the Register; believing that it will afford some others the pleasure in reading it that it has me,—and that by the blessing of God, it may "prove useful to some poor individual."

WM. B. MAXSON.

St. Croix, April 24, 1840.

DEAR LADY—Although not personally acquainted, yet the manner thro' which you have requested a letter from me, makes me feel a peculiar interest in commencing a correspondence, which I trust may be continued. Your kind address, together with the treatise, I received the day after your departure, and I regretted much my not having made your acquaintance. I should have been most happy to have conversed with you on so important a subject as the salvation of Israel, in which we, as the followers of the Lord Jesus Christ, must be equally interested. As you have requested a statement of the change of my sentiments, I will, with the assistance of the Holy Spirit, endeavor to do so, hoping through my humble means, to be useful to some poor individual.

I cannot say that I was brought up in a strict observance of the Jewish laws, and not altogether among my own persuasion, in which I continued until I was 18 years of age, when I began to feel that there was something wanting for the mind to dwell upon. The set form of Hebrew prayer which I had been accustomed to repeat without understanding it, no longer afforded me any comfort or consolation. Perhaps I was aroused to this by my situation, which did not accord with my love of peace and quiet. O, how good is God! How unbounded is his love! All things will work together for good to them that love him. He has been a merciful Father to me, and now am I enabled to approach Him whom I so grievously offended, as a blessed Savior. But I have digressed, feeling that all praise is due to Him who deals with us not as we deserve.

Two or three years passed without my giving any serious reflections to my state; yet there was a something that often caused me to feel that all was not right. At this time God saw fit to allow an intimacy to commence with a pious and beloved young friend, who was every way calculated to aid me in all that my heart desired. I saw, admired, and loved that which made her so happy; but I dared not enquire, fearing to be drawn away from the state of suffering which I thought was right for me as a Jewess. A sister of mine having married at this time, my friend and myself accompanied her to one of our Islands for a few weeks, and here occupying the same room with my beloved friend, I saw, after I had retired to bed, that she lingered to read God's holy word, and bend her knees to him who loves prayer. I reflected on this, and sighed to think I was not encouraged to do this by my church, yet from this, I determined to introduce the reading of the scriptures on my return home, which I was enabled to do, confining it to the Old Testament, but I found no rest for my wearied soul. My mind being in this state, a general debility took place, and I was reduced to such a state of weakness, that a change was necessary. But previous to my departure for the United States, I had a singular dream, which will never be forgotten by me. I thought two figures appeared by my bedside, one was Jesus and the other Moses. I extended my left hand to Moses; when a still small voice whispered, "Believe on me." I immediately turned round and gave my other hand to the Lord, when I awoke with very pleasant feelings. I told this dream to several persons, for I could think of nothing but my dream. Soon after this, I sailed for the U. S. to visit my brother and sister who had removed there. Since their union, they had become members of the New Jerusalem church. I attended every Sunday, and several times heard my dear brother, who had a few years previously lived without God in the world, preach Jesus Christ, the Way, the Truth, and the Life. Yet my unbelieving heart refused to assent to what my understanding could not but be convinced of. I had believed that God was one, & the Trinity was my stumbling-block. During my residence with my brother, many truths were revealed to me, and laid the foundation of anxious inquiry on my part. In this state I joined my dearest earthly friend, who was about to leave the United States for the West Indies, our home. Unitedly we commenced the responsible office of teaching children. Here I had daily an opportunity of being advanced in the truths of christianity. The happy result of its divine influence were practically made manifest in all that my friend said and did; yet I must be convinced, as a Jewess, that God was one. I prayed to be convinced. Swedenborg's works with my Bible were my constant reading, and gradually did the Holy Spirit unfold to my view the blessed Savior,—the Jehovah of the Old Testament—Jesus of the New. I found that it was He who said in Isaiah xliii. 11: "I even I, am the Lord, and beside me there is no other Savior." Again in the xlv. 22: "Look unto me all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else." Again he said in John iii. 11: "That whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life." If I were to enumerate all the passages that convinced me that our Creator himself had redeemed Israel, I should fail in the attempt. When I felt this, I was quite willing to bow submissively to the mystery of the incarnation as centered in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ. "Thus saith the Lord, thy Redeemer, and he that formed thee from the womb, I am the Lord that maketh all things, that stretcheth forth the heavens alone, that spreadeth abroad the earth by myself." "But now thus saith the Lord that created thee, O Jacob! and he that formed thee, O Israel! Fear not for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name, thou art mine." "Jesus saith unto him, have I been so long time with you and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father, and how sayest thou then, show us the Father? Who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high." "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." "And now O Father! glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was."

I now felt that in acknowledging Jesus Christ, to be God of Heaven and earth, I did not divide the indivisible God; but that I approached him as a Savior, which is the only manner in which our finite minds can conceive of God, or approach him in love. Then will we be led to view him risen from the sepulchre, eternally one with the Father. Oh! what love for sinful man? that our Creator should have torn the veil which separated us from him on account of our sins,—taken on himself our corrupt form, bore our infirmities, carried our sorrows, and at last was glorified in being a sacrifice for sin, by the spilling of his own precious blood. O that all would exclaim, May I be washed white in the blood of the Lamb!

I am now a member of the Episcopalian church, but I have no sectarian principle, and I look forward to the conversion of the great part of the christian world, it being merely nominal christianity; and in proportion as this advances; so much we trust and pray that our oppressed brethren will arise and exclaim, "What must I do to be saved!"

I hope dear lady, that this [illegible] tion may commence a correspondence [illegible] will be mutually beneficial to us, and perhaps to others.

I am your friend in christian love,

H. B. BENJAMIN.

[illegible] 28.

On this passage, Mr. Barnes remarks thus: "He returned early to the Mount of Olives, and taught in the temple. [illegible] Savior did not waste his mornings in idleness or sleep. He rose early, and repaired to the temple. The people, also, flocked to the sanctuary to hear him. This example is at once an encouragement to early rising, and to the early worship of God. It is a reproof of those who spend the part of the day best fitted for devotion in unnecessary sleep. And it shows the propriety, where it can be done, of assembling early in the morning for prayer, and the worship of God. Early prayer meetings have the countenance of the Savior, and will be found to be eminently conducive to the promotion of religion. Let the day be begun with God, and the work of piety is easy. Let the world have the ascendancy in the morning, and it will be likely to have it also at noon day, and at evening." I hope that these suggestions of Mr. Barnes, will increase our interest in the morning meetings, which have been such precious seasons to some in this village for a few weeks past.

For the Register.

Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines; for our vines have tender grapes.—BIBLE.

I have long been in the habit of associating the cause of temperance with that of religion; and considering that whatever directly advances one, indirectly promotes the other. Hence I infer that a few short articles touching the former will not be unwelcome to the columns of a religious editor, nor the eyes of his readers.

The immense evils entailed on our land by liquor-selling-taverns, have led to inquiry in my own mind, whether the dire calamities may not be averted without robbing the traveller of a comfortable home.

Some tell us, "indoctrinate community in the principles of doing right, and the evil is no more." In this, however, a difficulty as serious as the former is manifest: for it has long been established that "because sentence against an evil work is not speedily executed, the heart of man is fully set in him to do evil." Hence the necessity of a motive aside from the intrinsic excellence of virtue, to induce men to abandon a lucrative traffic, because it is fraught with evil. Till such a motive can be seen; or till "Temperance Houses" are made popular and profitable, the cause of Temperance must beat against wind and tide, ere it is safely moored in the haven of security.

Should it meet your approbation, I propose in some future numbers to present to the consideration of your readers a few facts and inferences in relation to this subject.

SOLILOQUIST.

REVIVAL RECORD.

Lynn, Mass.—During the last month, says the editor of the Puritan, the indications of a revival have been more decided. There have been a number of hopeful conversions; and the meetings are attended with deep solemnity. All the appearances promise an interesting revival.

Malden Centre, Mass.—In this place thirty-three have been hopefully converted, and others are anxious. Twenty-seven have been received to the church (Methodist) on trial.—Puritan.

Charlestown, R. I.—This town has been remarkable for a destitution of religious privileges. There never was a house of public worship in the town except the one owned by the remnant of the Narragansett Indians. In February, a revival commenced of unusual power. The solemnity of the judgment day seemed to reign in the assemblies. Many cases of conversion have occurred. A church has been organized with twenty-six members. In March, nineteen were baptized. The people are now making efforts to build a house for public worship. Eighty have signed the Temperance pledge since the revival commenced.—Ibid.

Maine.—The following accounts are condensed from the Christian Mirror:—

In Sumner there is the beginning of a revival.

Industry.—Several individuals have recently indulged hope, and many more attend inquiry meetings, and appear deeply impressed with a sense of their need of an interest in Christ. Christians are greatly revived.

New Sharon is now sharing in the good work.

New Gloucester.—The work of grace is still gradually advancing. New cases of awakening and hope occur weekly. Twenty-six persons have united with the Congregational church.

Bangor and Vicinity.—The work of grace still continues.

[illegible] have been a considerable number of conversions.

[illegible] is commencing.

[illegible] Mirror re- [illegible] the difference between the past and present habits of our citizens appear more obvious than in this:—

[illegible]

[illegible] immortality and a world to prepare for it."

[illegible]—This country is new, having been settled but about five years. The village contains about 600 inhabitants. In the spring of 1837, a small meeting house was erected, and Rev. Cyrus L. Watson settled as pastor of the Presbyterian church; besides which there are Baptist and Methodist churches. In February last, meetings of six or seven days continuance were held in the Presbyterian and Methodist churches. The church was revived and stirred up to prayer and effort; and there was a general awakening among sinners, and a disposition to go the house of prayer, such as had never before been witnessed in that region. Opposition was disarmed; infidelity silenced; backsliders reclaimed; and dead professors from the East, who had left their religion behind them, were brought to light. As the result of this work, 54 have united with the churches; and about twenty more are regarded as converts. Most of the converts were young persons, between 18 and 36. One young woman came alone fourteen or fifteen miles over the prairie, saying she had heard that God was there, and she wanted to find out for herself.—She went home, rejoicing in the Lord.—The work still progresses; and the house, which it was supposed would be larger than would be needed for a number of years, is now to strait for them.

Wisconsin.—A gentleman in Wisconsin writes to his brother in New Haven, that revivals are prevailing extensively there, exceeding in power and interest any thing he ever saw in New England. In a neighborhood not far from Southport, about a dozen infidels banded together in a club, to oppose the work, but, in a short time, every one of them was converted. Surely the Lord has designs of mercy for this guilty land.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

LATER FROM FRANCE.

By the packet ship Burgundy, Captain Lines, Paris and Havre papers to the 30th of April inclusive are received. By the British Queen we had Paris advices to the 28th, evening.

It was reported in Paris that the King of Naples had refused the mediation of the King of the French, between himself and Great Britain, and that he was determined on resistance. It was reported also that Austria had offered him assistance to the amount of 30,000 men. The English steamer Hydra had captured five vessels (merchantmen) on the coast of Sicily. Dispatches had arrived at Toulon in answer to the King's offer of mediation, but their tenor was not known, save by rumor. There is no truth, probably, in the Austrian part of the story, and the rest is rather doubtful.

The U. S. sloop of war Cyane arrived at Toulon on the 25th of April. On the some say another instalment of 3,000,000 francs, of the Haytian debt, was landed at Toulon.

A squadron of three vessels was about sailing from Toulon for the China seas, to look after French interests during the strife with England.

The commissioners appointed to regulate commercial intercourse between England and France have finished their labors, and their report may be expected soon.

There is no later news from Algiers.

From the East the intelligence is still ominous of coming trouble. The resolution of Pacha remained unshaken, and he had given a new proof of it by appointing the traitor Captain Pacha, to the command of the united Egyptian and Turkish fleets. This had caused great irritation at Constantinople. The Pacha's military preparations, in Syria as well as Egypt, were on the most extensive scale. In the former he is said to have 80,000 men.

From Spain we have again intelligence of the death of Cabrera—announced as positively as before, and perhaps as truly. —Com. Adv.

SUMMARY.

The Crops.—From Ohio we have discrepant statements in relation to the growing crops. The Ohio State Journal has the following:

The Wheat Crop.—In many parts of the State, we hear of ravages by the fly among the growing grain. This is said to be the case in Clark, Champaign, and Hamilton counties. In this county some damage has been done.

The Michigan papers speak of a most promising harvest. As a general rule, the extent of mischief to crops is overrated.—We hope it may prove so in the present case. Our accounts from the North represent the prospects of the farmer as fair.

The Zanesville, Ohio Republican has the following:

Crops.—Accounts from all directions give the most flattering prospects of the growing crops—they will be even more abundant than last year.

Drowned.—The body of a woman floated ashore near the South Ferry, Brooklyn, yesterday afternoon about 3 o'clock. She had on a dark colord dress and no stockings. Her clothes were very much torn, and her head was dreadfully broken and shattered.

The body of a drowned man was picked up in the North River, opposite Hoboken, by some fishermen, day before yesterday, and taken to Hoboken, where an inquest was held upon it by Mr. John G. Spear, Justice. His name was Christoff Mayer, and was one of four who were drowned near Canal street on the evening of the 10th inst.—Journal of Commerce.

Wonderful Escape from Death.—Three or four weeks ago a Mr. Ladd, who was traveling on foot in Iowa territory, near Fort Madison, was fallen in with by three other men, to whom, in the course of conversation, he imparted the knowledge of his having four or five hundred dollars about him, which he was going to pay in at the land office. The three strangers instantly determined to obtain the money, and on their reaching a broken part of the country attacked Mr. L. with clubs and knives, killed him as they thought, robbed him, threw him into a ravine, covered him with brush, and then continued on their journey.

A rivulet of water flowed down the ravine in which Mr. Ladd lay buried, and the refreshing element coming in contact with his wounded head, had the effect of cleansing the wounds and restoring him to life. Knowing the route of the robbers, he instantly set out in pursuit of them—reaching Fort Madison, where he heard they had descended the river—procured a skiff—reached St. Louis, and in an hour or two apprehended two of the ruffians. The third had not yet reached the city, and was arrested on landing a short time afterward. The villains were the next day taken back to Iowa, and the court being in session, were instantly tried, convicted, and sent to the penitentiary, one for 5 years; another for 10, and the third for 23. How much of the money Mr. L. was able to recover we have not heard.—Peoria Register.

Latest from Texas.—In the New Orleans papers of the 20th ult., we have news from Texas to the 16th ult. General Canales and Colonel Carbajal, of the Mexican Federal army, have arrived in Houston, but report no late movements of their party.—Their army of the frontier numbers eight hundred Mexicans, independent of foreigners. The whole population of the frontier States is ready to co-operate with them. The Centralists are about three thousand strong, stationed at Matamoras, Monterrey, and Laredo.

General Canales, in his official report of the encounter with Arista on the Rio Grande, estimates the number of killed, wounded and missing, on the part of the Federalists at eighty-four, and on the other side at six hundred.

MALIGNITY EXTRAORDINARY.

ALTON, Thursday, May 21, 1840.

About 12 o'clock last night some person or persons with fiendish intent to destroy the town, blew up the magazine containing nearly 600 kegs of powder. This depot was placed a few years since in a notch below the high mound on the brink of the precipice of rocks three or four hundred yards above the mill and Penitentiary.—The stone, of which it was built, was driven through all parts of the town, and vast numbers of descending rocks broke through roofs and floors, and were buried in the cellars and in the earth through every street. The concussion has destroyed most of the glass, sash, doors, &c. On the side and ends of the buildings fronting the direction of the magazine, many houses were much shattered, and a few materially injured. It will require, several thousand dollars to repair damages. It is singularly providential that not a life was lost or a single individual injured. There were, however, many hair-breadth escapes.

A slip from the office of the Ithaca Journal gives an account of a most disastrous fire which occurred at that flourishing village on the 28th ultimo. The best built part of the place is in ruins. The number of buildings burnt is not given. The amount of property destroyed is stated at sixty or seventy thousand dollars, only about twenty thousand of which is covered by insurance. Few villages in our state have suffered more severely from this all devouring element, within a short period than has Ithaca.—Bapt. Register.

North River.—A new line of steamers, the Rochester and De Witt Clinton, commenced their regular trips upon this river on Monday the 1st inst., leaving Albany every evening (sundays excepted) at 8 o'clock.—By this arrangement, passengers arriving in the cars from Syracuse at half-past 8 in the morning, can remain in this city four hours for the transaction of business, and then take the train which leaves for Albany at a quarter before 1, P. M., and arrive in New York the next morning from 5 to 6, A. M., early enough for most business engagements.—Bap. Register.

Destructive Freshet in the Savannah River.—A passenger in the cars from Aiken of May 29, brings the melancholy intelligence of a most disastrous freshet in the Savannah river, by which the town of Hamburg has been almost entirely submerged, attended by the destruction of the upper bridge and also of that connecting Hamburg with Augusta, with an immense amount of property, and it is feared many lives. The cars from this place had not been able to reach within several miles of Hamburg, and the upper portion of the Rail Road has, it is to be feared, sustained serious injury.—Patriot.

Col. Crockett.—The Texas Sentinel pronounces the story about Col. Crockett being alive and prisoner in the Mexican mines to be a hoax. The rumor never rec'd any credit at Austin. It is a mistake that the President was ever imposed upon by the trick, or that he ever contemplated writing to the friends of Crockett. The facts of the case are simply these:—For many months the Federalists have been trying their utmost to get the Texans embroiled in their quarrel with the Centralists, and have resorted to every artifice to effect the purpose. Among other things, the Crockett humbug was tried. The expectation was that when the rumor got abroad, thousands of volunteers from Tennessee and other states would flock to the standard of Federalism to liberate their countryman.—N. O. Bul.

Mysterious.—The dwelling of a respectable citizen of Aiken, S. C. was entered on the 24th ult. by a stranger, while the family were all out with the exception of two little girls. The lady of the house shortly afterwards came home, and finding a stranger there, ordered him out, when he drew a pistol and shot at her, but without effect. He was pursued by a number of citizens, who, after receiving several shots from him, managed to capture him, after having mortally wounded him. Before he died he stated that he was the son of Judge Sherman of Connecticut, and was determined never to be arrested alive.—Phila. Paper.

Rencountre.—We learn from the Tennessee Sentinel of this morning, that in an affray between Rev. Wm. C. Brownlee and Col. L. C. Haynes, in the street at Jonesborough, yesterday morning, the former was shot in the thigh. The wound is not considered dangerous. The Sentinel says,—"We forbear to make any comment upon this transaction, as we understand it will be the subject of legal investigation." —Abbingdon Virginian.

Fatal Duel.—The Toronto, U. C. Transcript of the 21st. reports the fatal issue of a duel which was recently fought at Montreal, between Lieut. Col. White, of the 7th Hussars, and Mr. Grant, late of the 79th Regiment. The Colonel fell from the fire of his opponent. The cause of the quarrel had reference to the conduct of Colonel White towards a young lady related to Mr. Grant.

Honesty.—An individual, whose name we believe is Spears, stopped near the Raccourci bend, the wreck of a flat boat, which it is supposed was floating down the Mississippi from Natchez, and found in it upwards of $5,000, principally in Louisiana money, and immediately delivered all to the Parish Judge of Pointe Coupee.—Baton Rogue Gaz.

The Rebuilding of Natchez.—Our poor desolated city, says the Free Trader of the 16th, begins to teem like a bee hive with the clatter of hammers, and the bustle of repairs and rebuilding. Something is being done to almost every dwelling which can, by any possibility, be repaired. If the dry weather should continue ten days longer a considerable part of our population who remain in the city at that time, will be so sheltered, that they will be protected from the rain in their beds.

Carpenters are asking $5 a day at Natchez.

A violent shock of an Earthquake, accompanied by a roaring noise, was experienced at St. Louis on the night of the 21st ult., a little before twelve o'clock.

The oldest man in the house of Representatives is J. Q. Adams; the youngest, Edward Stanley, of North Carolina; the largest, Dixon H. Lewis, of Alabama—who weighs over four hundred pounds—the tallest, Aaron Vanderpoel; the shortest, J. A. Bynum.

A Veteran.—An English paper mentions that W. Buck, boatswain of the Plymouth dock-yard, the person who nailed the British flag to the mast-head of the Royal Sovereign, at Lord Howe's great engagement in 1794, has been superannuated with a pension of £160 a year.

A Race.—Mr. Steven's celebrated Yacht, sailed this morning for England, in company with the packet ship South America. Considerable amounts have been staked on the speed of the two vessels.

Running away with a Steamboat.—The Cincinnati News states that the mate and crew of the steamboat Osceola, cut her loose from the wharf, while the Captain was asleep in his berth. It is added that a fracas took place on board of her after she departed, and that the mate lost his life.

A very old Ship.—The St. John's Herald of the 27th inst. says, "the curious in naval architecture, may have an opportunity of gratifying their curiosity, by a sight of a vessel now in our harbor, the 'Volunteer,' of Hull. This antique specimen of British oak, is 110 years old, and was employed as a transport prior to the taking of Quebec. She is the identical ship in which the immortal Wolfe came to this continent. Should she come in contact now with one of our province built vessels, she would be found a hard nut to crack.

Imported Stock.—In the packet ship Philadelphia, Captain Morgan, which recently arrived from London, there were brought out a large number of the most valuable English cattle and sheep. The cows are of the best breed of the Herefordshire, and the sheep are the Cotswold cross of the Bakewell Linconshire, all of an extraordinary size, and, notwithstanding the effects of a sea voyage, in fine condition. They were imported by W. H. Southard, of Jefferson County, in this state, on his own account, and for Erastus Corning, of Albany.

Hail.—A violent storm lately visited some parts of Kentucky. In Herring county it was so severe that it stripped the trees of their leaves and young fruit, beat down grain, corn and grass; window glass was broken and birds, fowls, lambs, and even calves and colts were killed.

Arrest of the Murderer.—Nowlan, the person who murdered his wife at No. 64 Centre street, was yesterday arrested by officer McGrath. After a brief examination by the magistrate, he was fully committed for trial.

Seizure of American fishermen.—An extract from the Halifax Times of May 26, forwarded to Messrs. Topliff by the steamer North America, from St. John, N. B. states that the Brit. schr. Victory, Capt. Darby, siezed two American fishing schooners, the Papineau, and the Mary, of Maine, on Tuesday morning, May 19.

Another Mysterious Re-Appearance.—The Pennsylvanian says,—"Fry, the drover, who a week or two since disappeared so mysteriously from the hotel of Mr. Thompson in Callowhill street, was seen a few days ago in Lewiston, in this state, on his way to Pittsburgh."

Methodist Episcopal Church.—It appears from a Baltimore letter in the Commercial Advertiser, that the increase of the Methodist Episcopal Church, during the four years ending in September last, was 515 ministers and 89,781 church members.—Since the accounts were made up in Sept., the ascertained increase is 14,000, making a total increase of upwards of 100,000 members. At the general conference of 1836 the number of ministers belonging to the Methodist Episcopal church was 2,781, and of members, 650,597. In Sept. 1839, 3,390 ministers, and 740,459 members.

The peculiar feature of this boat, is her horizontal engines placed with her boilers upon the guards, leaving the whole centre of the boat from stem to stern, for the comfort and accommodation of the passengers.

POETRY.

THE SWALLOWS.

An American poet, named SPRAGUE, of whose history we know nothing, is the author of the following beautiful poem, suggested by the incident of two swallows having entered a Church during Divine Service. It is a production of great feeling and happy thought. See Psalm lxxxiv. 3. The Arabian Poch Nabegi has some magnificent verses on the same subject.—The Churchman Magazine.

Gay, guiltless pair,
What seek ye from the fields of heaven?
Ye have no need of prayer,
Ye have no sins to be forgiven.

Why perch ye here,
Where mortals to their Maker bend?
Can your pure spirits fear
The God ye never could offend?

Ye never knew
The crimes for which we come to weep;
Penance is not for you,
Blest wanderers of the upper deep.

To you 'tis given
To wake sweet nature's untaught lays:
Beneath the arch of heaven
To chirp away a life of praise.

Then spread each wing,
Far, far above, o'er lakes and lands,
And join the choirs that sing
In yon blue dome not rear'd with hands.

Or if ye stay,
To note the consecrated hour,
Teach me the airy way,
And let me try your envied power.

Above the crowd
On upward wings could I but fly,
I'd bathe in yon bright cloud,
And seek the stars that gem the sky.

'Twere heaven indeed
Through fields of trackless light to soar,
On nature's charms to feed,
And nature's own great God adore.

WILLIAM COURTNAY.

A SKETCH.

"Well, Jane, 'tis as I expected: George Graham has failed to the amount of 30,000 dollars, Harry Wilberton, his other endorser is involved to a still larger sum; so you see the whole burden will fall upon me which will ruin us. The officer will be here to-morrow to execute our whole estate, and turn us out pennyless, to drag out a life of destitution and misery."

These words were spoken by Mr. Courtnay to his young wife, as he entered his comfortably furnished parlor late one evening. Five summers had passed away since they stood at the marriage altar, and happiness had been richly shared by them. Their handsome estate, through care and economy, had increased rapidly, and two interesting children were added to their domestic comfort.

Charles Courtnay, although a persevering, saving man in business, and among the best of husbands and kindest of parents, was too confiding, and unfortunately often permitted his fellow feelings for others, to be extended to a hazardous indulgence He had however up to this period, suffered but little injury. Being a warm friend of Mr. Graham's he had become responsible for several debts, not dreaming that it was possible for a man of Graham's reputed capital, and professed honesty, to fail. In this he had been disappointed. Having entertained fears of this kind for some time, and finding them true, he gave his wife full information of the worst. Jane Courtnay was prepared for it, for both had long expected it. When she heard it she tried to alleviate, rather than increase her husband's distress.

"They may sell the property, Mr. Courtnay," replied she, "and I may be pennyless and destitute, but as long as I am with you, sharing the love and sympathy of your heart, I shall not be unhappy."

"Ah! Jane, you are not aware of the stern reality of the case. You have been brought up in ease and affluence, and have been taught to regard poverty, if attended with love, as Poets have penciled it—a flowery vale with no thorn to pierce; but 'tis time now to strip it of its ideality, for alas! you must too soon realize its painful reality."

"No, Mr. Courtnay, you mistake me: I know the picture of rural poverty, as drawn by many romancers is often exaggerated, especially when such a state is attended with ignorance and mental stupor; but what is there to allay our happiness, even should your estate, which is the result of care and industry, be sacrificed on account of the wild spirit of speculation in others? Happiness does not consist in the pageantry of wealth, nor the vain trappings of fashion; it is of higher origin, and imparts to its possessor a more tranquil enjoyment than these can give. Cannot we be as happy then—yea, happier than heretofore, when secluded from the trouble and parade of this place—divested of the cares and perplexities we now have, we can commune more devotionally, with the great author of all good; and have no bitterness to obtrude upon our rural quietude."

"No bitterness to obtrude! Where will be the bitter remembrance of your beautiful, but lost home—your ornamented rooms—the merry laughing throng of fashionable visitors—the pomp—luxury—and all you have been accustomed to in your earlier years! Oh, Jane! it is too much. I wooed and won you from your childhood home—you shared your fortune with a destitute orphan, and now at a period, when he was happy in the reflection, that instead of lessening that fortune, he was increasing it, to have all swept away, you beggared, and our little Louisa and Sarah reduced to a state little less than orphanage.—Oh, it is too hard."

"William, do not suffer yourself to indulge in such melancholy feelings. Think not, because I am a woman, I cannot suffer with you, were it necessary. I could be happy any where with you and under any circumstances, did I know I was banishing gloom from your mind. But in this case we have no need of suffering. We will sell our carriage—furniture, and all our gay equipage—pay all, and enough will be left to procure a little home. We will have it in the shady wood, surrounded by flowery vales and lovely landscapes. I will adorn my rooms with green wreathes and wild flowers. My merry throng will be composed of my dear husband, and our little girls. I will plant woodbines, and jessamines around our cottage door; and underneath its thick foliage, we will sit at evening, and watch the setting sun, and the wild flowers, as they bow their heads, and sink to their dewy nest. We'll gaze on the moon as she wanders through shapeless clouds, and clustering stars. We'll listen to the low music of the distant water-fall, and the quiet murmurings of the green banked rivulet, and think of the sweet repose of our happy home, and the unagitated tranquility of our own bosoms. Oh! William we will be so happy, that I scarcely regret this change of fortune."

Jane Courtnay's eyes filled with tears, as she concluded, and her husband, throwing his arms around her, exclaimed, "Yes, Jane, we will be happy—can I be any thing else, while you are mine? We will sell all,—repair to the country—and spend our days in preparing for that better home, where disappointment and changes are unknown."

Mr. Courtnay did not forget his determination, he immediately made such sacrifices as satisfied all claims against him, purchased a pretty farm in a retired part of the country, where he is now living in seclusion, and happy in the enjoyment of the society of his wife and two lovely children, Louisa and Sarah. Why be wretched then on account of the sad reverses we meet with here? We should use, and not abuse them; for if sanctified by the hand of heaven, and submitted to cheerfully by us, a design may be accomplished very essential to the consummation of our bliss in that land beyond the grave. MUNFORD.

Penultima, Williamson co. Tenn. 1840.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

TO THE THINKER.

DEAR SIR:—I was much interested in the anecdote which you gave us, illustrative of the character of Dr. Cautus. I was formerly somewhat acquainted with the Dr. myself. I have often been amused to notice how he would manage to express an opinion concerning any proposed enterprise in such a manner, that if it proved successful, he would claim to himself some share of credit, as one of the projectors, but if it proved a failure, he could say with a significant motion of the head, "Well, you know what I told you."

A young gentleman, Mr. Experiment, who had been solicited to take charge of a weekly religious periodical, asked the Dr. to be so kind as to give him advice on two points:

1st, "Is it best for me to accept the proposal? and 2nd, If I accept of it, in what manner shall I proceed to discharge the duties which will devolve upon me?"

Perhaps it is scarcely necessary to say, that the reply to the first question was so constructed that should the gentleman become a far famed editor, the name of Dr. Cautus would be emphatically whispered in all the knowing circles, as the man who gave him the impetus which secured his celebrity; but if he should furnish proof that the editorial chair was no seat for him, it might be said, "If he had only taken heed to the wise counsel of good Dr. Cautus, he might have made something."

What the Dr. said in reply to the second question, ought not to be lost, and I send a record of it to you, Mr. Thinker, that you may preserve it. I cannot stay to write the Doctor's long and sensible discourse about the importance of the undertaking, until he came to specifications as follows: "Be careful and not get in advance of public opinion. Let your paper be the news-gatherer; let it tell what is done, but do not so involve it in doing, that it shall get a pioneer character. In recording passing events, you must be constantly on your guard, or you will get yourself unhappily committed. Sometimes events of great moment may transpire at your own door, under your own eye, and they may be of such a character that you cannot even mention them, without seeming to advance some opinion of your own relative to them, or in reference to some enterprise of philanthropy or reform, with which they may be intimately connected, or at least, may thus be associated in the public mind. In such a case, let them pass in silence; and fill up your paper with the most interesting foreign news that you can find. Into that throw your soul with all its energy.

When those that have espoused some unpopular cause, wish you to give them aid, withhold; and if you apprehend that the more godly portion of your readers will be dissatisfied with you, immediately seize your pen, and write a powerful article against some sin, some flagrant act of injustice, some palpable wrong, being sure that your selection will be such as shall secure the popular favor. While I think of it, I will just hint to you, that if you should find a complaint rising from any quarter, that you fail to manifest sufficient philanthropy, and love of equity and liberty, your course must be to attack, most boldly and resolutely, some unjust proceeding in some foreign country. Upon such an occasion you can give yourself full scope to speak out as strongly as you please in favor of liberty and equality, and none of your subscribers will be offended.

In theological contests, keep clear of being found on one side or the other. If any venture to suggest that you are deficient in decision of character, tell them that you are a peace-maker—that you mean to leave all to judge for themselves, without attempting to bias the opinions of any." Here the editor elect interrupted the Doctor, saying, "Sir, there may be some subjects of theological controversy, on which I shall feel strongly inclined to say something, enough to let my readers know that I have a mind about such matters." "That will be easy, and you need not commit yourself," said the Dr., smiling. "Here," said he, taking up a manuscript sermon, I will show you how I managed with my people on the question about the extent of the atonement.—The excitement became strong among them on the question, 'Was the atonement made for the elect solely, or for the whole human family?' Here is the brief conclusion to which I came, after one hour's discussion of the subject, viz:—The atonement is sufficient for all who will come. Both parties claimed me, and all seemed satisfied except a few who had been strongly tinctured with New England divinity in their youthful days."

"But Dr." said Mr. Experiment, "I may think it my duty to write an editorial on some question relating to the conduct of professed Christians, or the polished among the world." How shall I meet such an exigency? "After the manner in which I met a question of that kind," said the Dr., taking up another manuscript. "Some of the most genteel families of my parish encouraged a dancing school. Several pious persons were much troubled about it, and came to me with an earnest request that I would preach against the evil. Now I will read you an extract from a sermon which I preached on the next Sabbath. 'My beloved hearers! I exhort you to avoid all such amusements as are of an injurious tendency. Remember how precious is your time. Spend it as you ought.' Thus I went on, page after page. The next day, one lady who sent her daughter to the dancing school, desired me to inform her whether I meant to be understood as affirming before the whole congregation, that dancing was an injurious amusement? I had only to reply, that in performing my pulpit duties, my care was to state general principles, and my discerning hearers must make the application in accordance with the dictates of their own consciences. All became quiet; the dancing went on, its advocates being grateful that I had not openly denounced it as an injurious amusement, and the pious gave me many thanks for being so ready to comply with their wishes.'

"There is one item on which you have not touched, Dr.," remarked the gentleman, "concerning which I feel a great degree of anxiety; I allude to ecclesiastical controversies, those that respect the government, rights, privileges and decisions of the church, and possible even civil decisions respecting ecclesiastical interests and claims." "Keep to your rule," replied the Dr., "simply to tell what is done; come what will, stand neutral; both parties will claim you, also both will alternately accuse you of leaning to the other side; the accusations of one party you must show to the other, and thus you will keep the balance tolerably even.'

"Keep the balance tolerably even," were the words which Mr. Experiment often repeated in an under tone, and taking his leave of Dr. Cautus. The query which afforded him much mental discussion was this: As it costs the thief more pains-taking to avoid detection, than it would to be an honest man, will it not cost me more perplexity to conduct a paper after the plan of Dr. Cautus, than one promulgating principles which shall be fully known, and clearly understood of all men? "And then, how is it about doing good?" whispered conscience. "And that day, when deeds done in the body shall be examined," echoed the Bible. Y. W.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE PRAYING CHILD BEST PREPARED FOR DYING.

A TRUE STORY.

'GOOD NIGHT, good night, dear mother,
For I am sleepy now:'
His mother took his little hand,
And from his infant brow
She turned aside the silken curls;
Then solemnly she said,
'WILLIE, you have not said your prayers,
And can you go to bed?'

'No, dearest mother no;
Indeed I did forget;
But I will pray with all my heart,
For God's my Father yet.'
Then, as he lisped his evening prayer
Upon his mother's knee,
He kissed her cheek, and whispered low,
'God will take care of me.'

When little Willie laid
His weary head to rest,
He said that with the rising sun
He would be up and dressed;
And, running o'er the fresh green grass,
Till near his favorite tree,
He'd stop to listen to the birds
That sung so merrily.

Before the morning came
A flush was on his cheek;
He could not raise his heavy eye.
But once he tried to speak:
'Father, I love to say my prayers,'
Were all the words he said;
And, ere another sun had set,
The lovely boy was dead.

Over his early grave
His sorrowing parents wept;
But not with bitter tears, for there
His body only slept;
His happy spirit was in heaven:
And that's your mansion too;—
Morning and evening pray to God,
And He'll take care of you.

THE BROKEN CRUTCH.

One hot day in the month of June, a poor sun-burnt sailor, with but one leg, was going along the road, when his crutch broke in halves, and he was forced to crawl on his hands and knees to the side of the road, and sit down to wait till some coach or cart came by, whose driver he could ask to take him up. The first that passed was a stage-coach; but the man that drove it was a surly fellow, and he would not help the sailor, as he thought he should not be paid for it.

Soon after this, the sailor fell fast asleep upon the ground, and though a thick shower of rain came on, yet still he slept; for sailors, when on board their ships, have to bear all sorts of weather. When the wind blows, the waves of the sea often dash over the deck of the vessel, and wet the poor men to the skin, while they are pulling the ropes, and shifting the sails.

When the lame sailor awoke, he found a boy's coat and waistcoat laid on his head and shoulders to keep him from being wet; and the boy sat by in his shirt, trying to mend the broken crutch, with two pieces of wood and some strong twine. 'My good lad,' said the sailor, 'why did you pull off your own clothes to keep me from being wet?'

'O,' said he, 'I do not mind the rain, but I thought that the large drops that fell on your face would awaken you, and you must be sadly tired to sleep so sound on the ground.—See! I have almost mended your crutch which I found broken; and if you can lean on me, and cross yonder field to my uncle's farm-house, I am sure he will get you a new crutch. Pray do try to go there. I wish I was tall enough to carry you on my back.'

The sailor looked at him with tears in his eyes, and said—'When I went to sea, five years ago, I left a boy behind me, and if I should now find such a good fellow as you now seem to be, I shall be as happy as the day is long, though I have lost my leg, and must go on crutches all the rest of my life'

'What was your son's name?' the boy asked.

'Tom White,' said the sailor, 'and my name is John White.'

When the boy heard these names, he jumped up, threw his arms around the sailor's neck, and said, 'My dear, dear father, I am Tom White, your own little boy.'

How great was the sailor's joy, thus to meet his own child, and to find him so good to those who wanted help! Tom had been taken care of by his uncle while his father was at sea, and the sun-burnt lame sailor, found a happy home in the farm house of his brother: and though he had now a new crutch, he kept the old one as long as he lived, and showed it to all the strangers who came to the farm, as a proof of the kind heart of his dear son Tom.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LADIES COMPANION, (established in 1834,) a popular and highly esteemed MAGAZINE OF GENERAL LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS: embellished with Gorgeous and Costly Engravings on Steel, Copper and Wood, the Quarterly Fashions, and also with Fashionable and Popular Music, arranged for the Piano-Forte, Harp and Guitar.

TERMS—$3 a year. Single copies 25 cents.—Office 109 Fulton street, New York.

Mrs. L. H. Sigourney: The editors are happy to communicate the information to their readers, that arrangements have been effected with this talented lady by which she will still continue to be a regular and constant contributor to the 'Ladies Companion.' Her engagements in other quarters will not interfere with that connection with the 'Companion,' which secures to its readers the enjoyment of her beautiful productions.

Dr Oliver Wendell Holmes of Boston; Professor Longfellow of Cambridge College, and Mrs. Anna Maria Wells of Boston, will hereafter contribute to the 'Ladies Companion.'

SPLENDID NEW STEEL ENGRAVINGS by our best artists, accompany each number; illustrated by tales and spirited sketches, which will as heretofore, continue to be magnificent and far superior to those published in any cotemporary work in America.

QUARTERLY FASHIONS.

Plates of the prevailing Fashions appear once every three months, viz: December, March, June and September.

The Ladies Companion contains a larger quantity of reading than any other magazine issued in this country, and its subscription price is only three dollars a year. The great combination of talent secured for the coming year will render it unequalled by any other periodical.

THE MUSICAL DEPARTMENT.

This department of the Ladies Companion has ever commanded a large share of attention, and has been looked upon with no little interest by its readers, and more especially the Ladies, whom the publisher is in the highest degree anxious to please.—It will continue to be a subject of more than usual care to him, and to the Professor under whose supervision it is placed, to make that portion of the magazine allotted to Music, more than ever deserving of the countenance of every lover of music.—It has ever been and will continue to be the desire to have all pieces of Music printed correctly and free from errors.

Over every department an equally careful supervision will be strictly exercised by the Editors, and all appropriate expenditures will be liberally bestowed, as it is the design of the publisher, with the aid of his contributors and the advice of his friends to make the Ladies Companion distinguished for beauty and accuracy of its typography—the variety and high tone of its literary articles—and the unequalled splendor of its pictoral Embellishments, which are entirely new and engraved by A. Dick, expressly for the work.

It is the determination of the publisher to use every means to maintain the superiority which the Ladies Companion has obtained. For four years he has steadily pursued a course of improvement, and he flatters himself that his present facilities are such as to give the Ladies Companion eminent advantages over all other publications of its character.

From the foregoing it will be perceived that the Ladies Companion embraces every department within the range of Belles Letters and the Fine Arts: and no exertion or expense will be deemed too great to render the work equal to any other extant. The flattering and general testimonials of nearly every contemporary journal in the United States, and in fact many on the other side of the Atlantic, have strongly asserted the undeniable claims of the Ladies Companion to the support of the public generally. There is no work that gives its readers such a great return for their subscriptions.

TERMS,—$3 a year in advance, or $4 during the year. No subscription received for less than one year.

Complete sets of the volume from May, 1839, can be furnished at the subscription price by applying at the office. All letters must be addressed, post paid, to WM. W. SNOWDEN, 109 Fulton street, N. Y.

THE FAMILY ALTAR.

In one of the towns in the State settled by those fathers whose hearts burned for the enjoyment of that religious liberty they could not enjoy in an adjoining state, and in a retired part of the town where no thoroughfare rolled its continuous noise and tumult by the house to disturb the quiet or the devotion of its owners, you might, day after day, at the regular return of the hour of devotion in that abode of peace and comfort, behold a little circle bend the knee before the common Father of all mankind; and hear the sire, ripe in years, his countenance giving indication of manly toil and experience, pour forth his ardent supplications to Him who rules and directs in the affairs of men. But hark! His voice trembles in deep emotion. Why those rising, half-suppressed sobs from the bosom of the matron? Has sin disturbed their quiet, and goaded conscience to its work? Poverty of spirit—deep humility reigns in their breasts. Mark the empty seats of the children of their strength, now far from home! But why this emotion? Can they not trust them in the hand of the God they love? Yes! But nature, true to its trust, demands the anxious thought—the burning tear. Two frail flowers have left their home to seek for health in other climes, and one to seek in vain! And while from time to time they bow at the altar of prayer, they think, perchance, that far behind the western horizon their lovely daughter may be sleeping beneath the green-turfed mounds. Here nature yearns with anxious care, and the spirit bids it weep. But deeper thoughts than these cause the trill in the fond father's voice; for while he drinks in the spirit's inspiration with strong consolation in offering his daily sacrifice on the altar of prayer, he remembers the time when shrinking under the cross, and unable to move of himself as conscience said; this child, with the Bible in her hand and its divine principles in her heart, like a guardian angel came; pointed to the path of duty, and respectfully urged him on.

Again we look—there is no sob, nor trembling in the voice,

> But deep and calm, in all the majesty of prayer,
> Breaks his clear voice upon the evening air.

Why this change? Read in that open letter on the stand—the parents have read: Their S—— is gone! yes, gone to heaven. She walked not alone "through the dark valley," for Jesus shed a heavenly light around her dying bed and smoothed her path-way to the tomb. Why this calm? Where those deep burstings of heart, or overflowings of sorrow, that so oft await such news as this? Go ask at the altar of prayer. Listen for a moment! "O God! righteous and holy. Thou hast touched the tender cords of our hearts; but thou hast touched them with a father's hand, and we bless thy name. We thank thee for the gift, and for the length of its continuance. We thank thee for a Savior's love implanted in her breast, and reflected on us. O! we thank thee for the privilege of approaching thee at the family altar; and that through the blessed influence of our dear S—— we have been enabled to appreciate its blessings." Now son or daughter, which would you choose; a name trumpeted from the Temple of Fame? or a name perfumed with sweet memorials to be wafted o'er your grave?

THE SICK ROOM.

If any place in this world calls for wise and well dictated benevolence, it is the chamber of sickness and death. I am aware that the subject before the reader is one of great delicacy, but it is one on which some plain hints are called for. The writer has much opportunity for observation, and has been painfully taught by personal experience. It is earnestly hoped that what may be said will be kindly received, and it is devoutly desired that the reader never will forget the admonition.

A sick room is no place for curiosity.—What have I said? Curiosity in a sick and dying chamber? Yes, reader, you may have gazed upon an emaciated and suffering fellow being, and used up a portion of the vital air needed by a gasping mortal, when nothing but curiosity led you to that scene of suffering. Stop and inquire if it be not so. If no good word is to be said, or kind services to be rendered in a sick and dying room, it is the last place to which one should go as a mere spectator. Every new face, the tread of every uncalled-for foot, the demands upon the air for every breath, but the breathings of such as must be in attendance, is an injury in sickness and especially when debility is great. All the protestations of physicians, and the anxiety of family relatives, cannot control this evil or cure it. Nine out of ten feel as if it was rude neglect, if they are not invited into a sick room, and a direct insult if told that they must not go. I have seen persons go into such a room, and sit hour after hour with eyes fixed on the sick person, occasionally whispering to some equally indiscreet one that may chance to be nigh.—This is absolutely intolerable. We cannot endure the fixed gaze of half a dozen persons when well, and what must it be to one sinking and dying? Others will hang about the door and peep at the sufferer as they would steal a look at some show. I have seen this so much, that I can scarcely write and possess my soul in patience.

Another practice where the patient is very sick, is that of feeling the pulse, looking at the finger nails, examining the feet, with sundry other acts, all of which are accompanied with a very wise look, a sigh and a whisper. Those things are generally done by persons who very poorly understand their own tests of approaching death, and alike mistake the good and comfort of the dying. Think not that I would have the fact of approaching death kept from any friend or any fellow being; far from this; but let the matter be wisely, kindly and distinctly stated to the patient, and not by such untimely, and I must say, unkind hints and insinuations.

A sad mistake common in a dying chamber, is that the dying person has lost perception and sensibility, because unable to speak. I seriously believe that often, if not in general, the perceptions are more keen and delicate than when in health. I have been in circumstances which I shall never forget. For four hours I was speechless; I supposed, and all supposed, I was dying. NEVER, NEVER shall I forget what was said and done around me. Always let it be remembered, in a dying room, that the departing friend may hear all, and see all, when the persons present will little suspect. I remember to have said once in a dying room, where the person had not spoken for thirty-six hours, I did wish I could know the state of the dying individual's mind, not supposing my remark would be noticed by her who was scarcely this side of death. To my surprise she whispered in an ear by her pillow, "Tell Mr. —— that Jesus is as precious as ever." As I have been in hundreds of dying rooms, I might give many examples, to show that persons do notice and understand, when it is not suspected. How important that every thing in a dying room should be made what it ought to be, for the salvation and quiet of one who is being broken away from all dear on earth, and approaching all that is serious in eternity. Most generally, persons in this situation are much inclined to commune with their own hearts and the scenes about to open upon them. The sacredness and stillness of the scene should be disturbed with great care and caution.

The only thing I have to say in addition, is that a very great mistake is often made in the length of prayers, and loud speaking in prayer, in the sick room. This is an error too common, and often the occasion of great suffering to the sick and dying.

Let none understand the above remarks as intended to keep any away from the house of sickness and distress. No, reader, go to such places, and show your kindness to the afflicted members of the family, governed by the Christian tenderness which will ever keep in mind and reduce to practice the above cautions.—Bost. Rec.

GLORIOUS IN HOLINESS.

How varied the glories of the Godhead! There is one glory of the sun, another glory of the moon, and another of the stars, but their several condensed and concentrated glories are obscured and forgotten when the majesty of their Maker appears. God is glorious in all his attributes. How his justice is revealed in the judgments that have come from his throne; in that deluge of water that buried a world and that deluge of fire that made a burnt-sacrifice of the guilty cities of the plain; in that law that came down from heaven amid the thunders of Sinai, and in the revelations of that world of woe which he has prepared for the wicked! How his mercy shines in the rich provisions he has made for the salvation of his enemies; how it breathes on every page of his holy word and in every line of his works; how it sounds in the dying sighs of Calvary and the songs of redeeming love that go up from earth and come down from heaven. But the glory of his holiness is the glory of all his attributes combined. This is the fountain whence each and every stream of justice and mercy, of goodness and truth, flows forth. This ascription to God, "Who is like unto thee, Oh Lord, glorious in holiness," was made, not when the holiness of Jehovah, in its abstract purity, had been displayed, but when his mercy had been revealed in saving his people from the hand of their enemies and from the dangers of the sea. And when these delivered Israelites looked back over all the way through which the Lord had led them, they admired his holiness as the source of his goodness. So the soul, delivered from hell, looks up to God, and adores, not merely the mercy that snatched him as a brand from the burning, but the holiness that would have been magnified and honored had he perished forever. So the redeemed in glory veil their faces, and cast their crowns in the dust at the feet of the great Eternal, adore the holiness of Jehovah that burns and shines "like light condensed" in the habitation of his throne. Angels and sanctified spirits love to gaze on the holiness of God not through a glass darkly. Sinners, and even redeemed sinners sanctified but in part, sometimes shrink from this uncovered exhibition of God. They love to dwell on his benevolence, his wisdom, his faithfulness, his condescension, but the noon-day brightness of his spotless purity fills the heart with fear. The wicked feel "how awful virtue is" even in a frail fellow worm. But Oh, how awful is that virtue before which the heavens are unclean! No wonder that sinful man needs a Mediator between him and such a God! No wonder, when Moses asked the Lord to show him his glory, that God answered, "Thou canst not see my face: for there shall no man see me, and live."

Nevertheless we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. What a prospect for the saint! Like God! Like him in holiness; and like him because we shall see him as he is. There is a majesty, a moral grandeur beyond expression in that conception. Seeing God shall make the saint like God. Dwelling in his society, communing directly with the Father of Spirits, shall lead the saint upward through one degree of glory to another, until he is like the all holy Jehovah! The saint shall be glorious in holiness. The image of God which man lost by sin is the image to which he will be restored. "I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness."

IRENÆUS.

MORNING.

BY WILLIAM H. BURLEIGH.

Up Sluggard, from thy pallet! Lo the East
Heralds the coming of another day!
The burning sun advanceth, like a God,
To fling his wealth of light upon the world;
And the gray mists that in the vale have slept
Through all the solemn night, are curling up,
Slowly and silently, as if to steal
The golden splendor from the Fount of Day,
And weave it in their undulating folds!
The conscious earth is blushing in the light,
As a coy maiden, when she meets the glance
Of an impassioned lover—and the streams,
Leaping aad sparkling in the morning ray,
Send gaily forth their gurgling melody,
As if they knew another day was born.
The breezes, fragrance-laden, have awaked
From their brief slumber, and are flitting now,
On their light pinions, over hill and plain,
Wooing the perfume from the opening flowers,
And dallying with the leaflets. Every tree
Is vocal with the melody of birds;
And the awakening herbage flings abroad
Its dewy incense on the odorous air,
As conscious that its Maker will accept
The grateful offering—and many a voice,
From vale and mountain, and from shady grove,
Joins in the general anthem.

SIN.

Sin is the enemy of God, the disorganizer of the moral universe, the murderer of the soul, and the destroyer of angels. It is a dismal cloud surcharged with angry lightnings. It is a moral volcano, belching forth quenchless fires from its gaping crater. It has assaulted God, crucified his Son, violated infinite love, transformed angels into devils, and thrust devils down to hell. It has broken the chains of moral gravitation which bound our world in its orbit around the throne of God. It has effaced the image of God from the soul of man, cast the crown of glory from his head, and blasted the paradise of his being. It has cursed the earth with its thorns and thistles and blasted it with mildews. It has waked the hurricane, swollen the flood, clothed the tempest's brow with terror, surcharged the thunder cloud with fiery death, kindled the volcanic fires, poisoned the atmosphere, commissioned the pestilence, sent death into every dwelling, and strewed the earth with the bones of its slain. It has woven every shroud, fabricated every coffin, dug every grave, erected every tomb-stone, and written every epitaph. It has invaded the precincts of the domestic sanctuary, sundering the tenderest ties and poisoning the fountain of conjugal and filial enjoyment. It has stalked abroad in society, "scattering fire-brands, arrows and death" among mutual friends. It has envenomed the tongue of slander, opened the eye of jealousy, and swollen the heart with envy and pride. It has enervated the powers of intellect, obscured the mental vision, corrupted the fountain of thought, and poisoned the source of moral action. It has robbed the good of their innocence, and the virtuous of their purity. It has trampled on the claims of honor, and broken the laws of justice. It has scoffed at sacred things, and poured contempt upon dignity, truth and love. It has corrupted the soul with avarice and plundered the widow and orphan. It has ground the face of the poor, and trodden humanity in the dust. It has erected the tyrant's throne, nerved the despot's arm, quenched the fires of freedom upon her holy altars, chattelized the human soul, and fastened upon divine immortal man, the yoke and manacles of slavery. It has bribed the officer of justice, perverted the acts of legislation, kindled the fires of ambition, pointed the assassin's dagger, violated national faith, sounded the tocsin of war, drawn the devouring sword, arrayed embattled hosts in deadly conflict, drenched the earth with the blood, and strewed the earth with the bones of the slain. It has subverted governments, devastated kingdoms, and blotted whole nations from the face of the earth. It has produced in the bosom every pang of sorrow, armed the conscience with a scorpion sting, blasted the prospect of hope, covered the soul with the night-gloom of despair, clothed death with terror, enveloped the grave in darkness, kindled the quenchless fires of perdition, and banished innumerable millions "from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power."

O enemy! thou art the personification of all evil in earth and hell! And should man fold thee to his bosom? No, never.

SELF COMMUNION.—In your retirement, make frequent colloquies, or short discourses between God and thy own soul. "Seven times a day do I praise thee: and in the night season also, I thought on thee while I was waking." So did David; and every act of complaint or thanksgiving, every act of rejoicing or of mourning, every petition, every return of the heart in these intercourses, is a going to God and appearing in his presence, and representing him present to thy spirit, and to thy necessity. And this was, long since, by a spiritual person, called "a building to God, a chapel in our hearts." It reconciles Martha's employment with Mary's devotion, charity and religion, the necessities of our calling, and the employments of devotion. For thus, in the midst of the works of your trade, you may retire into your chapel, your heart; and converse with God by frequent addresses and returns.—Bishop Taylor.

SOURCES OF EVERY DAY HAPPINESS.—Occupation and a clear conscience, the very truant in the fields will tell you, are craving necessities. But when these are secured, there are higher matters which, to the sensitive and educated, at least, are to happiness what foliage is to the tree. They are refinements which add to the beauty of life without diminishing its strength; and, as they spring only from a better use of our common gifts they are neither costly nor rare. Many have learned secrets under the roof of a poor man, which would add to the luxury of the rich. The blessing of a cheerful fancy and a quick eye come from nature, and the trailing of a vine may develope them as well as the curtaining of a King's chamber.

Learning can only adore religion, but religion only can bless learning; so that learning is more beholden to religion than religion is beholden to learning.

The more free mercies are, the more acceptable they should be to us, and we should be more thankful for them to God.

Delays are not denials, and denials are not always refusals of prayers. Sometimes God's No is no negative; God may delay long, and deny often, yet grant at last.

FOR THE MINISTER.

The following is extracted from a sermon by the Rev. WILLIAM I. KIP, of the Episcopal church, Albany.

VARIOUS KINDS OF PREACHING WHICH FALL SHORT OF A MANIFESTATION OF THE TRUTH.

How much is there heard from the pulpit, which even wins for a time the applause of the crowd, but which in the light of the volume of inspiration, would not be considered as "a manifestation of the truth!" For instance, there is a style of preaching which commends itself to the worldly. It falls softly upon their ears, and they love it because it awakens no fears. It announces no awful truths, which could break up their repose, and startle them into attention. It utters no threats in the plain and unequivocal language of the Scripture, for fear they might grate harshly upon "ears polite."—It brings forward nothing which can trouble the conscience, or make the hearers humble themselves before God, feeling that the "remembrance of their misdoings is grievous unto them; the burden of them is intolerable." If it gives any view of the Gospel, it is that which is confined to its promises. It dwells upon the hopes and joys of the Christian, yet with so little discrimination, that all who hear, feel justified in appropriating them to themselves. The preacher does not deliver his message, as one who is conscious that he is standing among the dying—that on the right hand and on the left, they are passing into eternity—while he is the commissioned messenger to warn them of their coming doom. And the result is natural. The consciences of those who listen are soothed by the thought that they have week after week fulfilled their duty by attending the sanctuary. They have heard nothing there to alarm them, and therefore suppose they have no cause for fear. Even while sitting in their seats, and the preacher is uttering in their hearing, the harmless, pointless truths he weekly doles forth, the worldly man in his pew is planning out his schemes for the coming week. The coveteous are rejoicing in the remembrance of their gold and their merchandise—and the frivolous are sending their thoughts far over the mountains of vanity. And thus they go on through life—the earthly become more earthly—the giddy sons and daughters of pleasure devote themselves more deeply to their vain pursuits, and yet on the Sabbath, meet with no rebuke, to warn them that they are treading in the ways of death.

Again: there is another style of preaching which we may call the intellectual.—Chaste, yet cold, it is addressed entirely to the reason. It possesses a wide range of topics, all of which are included in some way within the pale of Christianity, yet the consideration of none of which will oblige the speaker to make any vigorous attack upon the citadel of the heart. From among the abstrusive, speculative points of our faith, he can choose many a theme on which to dwell, and as he reasons upon it, his hearers may be delighted with the varied learning he displays, or the weighty arguments he is heaping up; and yet, in all this, there is perhaps nothing to minister to their spiritual growth, or to build them up in a knowledge of the truth. His instructions fall upon his congregation like the cold rays of the moon, shedding abroad light indeed, yet light alone. They possess not the life-giving energy of the beams of the Sun of Righteousness. They neither warm nor quicken into fertility. His hearers are furnished with an hour of mental recreation, and they wish nothing more.—But for all the religious benefit they have received, they might as well have sat in the schools of Athens, and listened to the teaching of Socrates, or mused over the glowing reveries of Plato.

But again: there is a third style I would mention, which is equally ineffectual in producing any beneficial results. It is the preaching addressed to the imagination. And this is generally that which is most attractive to an audience, who have no love for the spiritual doctrines of our faith, and no wish to comply with its stern and self-denying precepts. Their taste is gratified by a gorgeous display of language. Their minds are excited by scenes pictured before them in which the fancy can revel.—They rejoice in sending their thoughts forward, and dwelling on the splendors of the coming world; and he who can best minister to this gratification, is the one in whose preaching they delight. But in what terms of reprobation can we speak of one, who for the sake of popularity lends himself to foster a taste like this, converting God's holy temple into a place of mere amusement—who strives to dazzle the mind, when he should impress the heart—who is gathering flowers to charm, when he should be sending forth the solemn warnings of the gospel—who is arraigning before his audience a series of pictures, when he should be bidding them flee to the cross for refuge—who, in truth, is preaching himself, when he should be preaching Christ Jesus? With regard to such an one, we may well ask, in the indignant words of the christian poet,

> "—will he seek to dazzle me with tropes,
> And play his brilliant parts before my eyes
> When I am hungry for the bread of life?"

But all this can never "commend the truth to the conscience." Religion becomes an instrument for dramatic exhibition. The sensibilities are addressed, and the feelings kindled up, while all the essential ingredients of devotion are absent. The striking eloquence of the preacher arouses, perhaps, an enthusiasm similar to that which is awakened by the charms of poetry; but the emotions are fictitious, and have no deep foundation in the heart. They are like those which we sometimes see excited over the page of romance, when even the reader's tears are called forth, as he dwells upon a tale of imaginary distress; yet scarcely are they dried, when the petition of real misery will be met with frigid indifference. And thus it is, that when the preacher has been exhausting his eloquence upon some of the more awakening topics of our faith, there are those whose enthusiasm is awakened, but who yet, when they have passed from the sanctuary, evince by their worldly conduct, that their emotions were only "as a morning cloud, and as the early dew." It was but creating an idle and profitless excitement, which is rather injurious, by diverting attention from those subjects which best demand our concern. It touches not the deep springs of moral action, and therefore the inward, spiritual man is unaffected.

You will anticipate me then, my brethren in remarking, that he who is satisfied with delivering his message in either of these three ways, can never hope, "by manifestation of the truth, to commend himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God." No; his endeavors are worse than useless. "The hungry sheep look up and are not fed," while the shepherd, who should have ministered to their spiritual wants, is treasuring up for himself a fearful retribution, in the day when his Lord shall demand the account of his stewardship.

And yet, I would not be understood as discountenancing all appeals from the pulpit, to the higher powers of the mind, or to the imagination. Far from it. It is only when the appeals are confined to these, that I object. When the gospel is fairly preached, both these parts of our nature may well be enlisted to deepen the impression. At the present day, indeed, when men of cultivation and science are bowing to the cross, they must be reached in some measure, through the medium of the intellect; and while our churches are thronged with those whose taste has been refined by education, their attention may at times be arrested, by an appeal to the sensibilities. But the deficiency to which I allude is, that united with these things, the grand and solemn truths of the Gospel—those which alone are calculated to move the heart—are not inculcated.

A minister should never plead spirituality for being an idler or a sloven.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

We present to our juvenile readers this week the following very touching and instructive story, in the hope that they may learn to lay up an important treasure beyond the reach and influence of the enemies of truth. The treasure to which we allude is invaluable. No child, whether rich or poor, high or low, but should possess it; for knowledge, under almost any circumstances, can be obtained so far as to answer the great purposes of life and godliness. In order to its attainment, however, there must be close and unremitted application, and time and circumstances improved to the best advantage. The knowledge thus obtained is beyond the reach of avarice or oppression. We may be deprived of the comforts of life, of friends, and of Liberty; but not of the enjoyments and comforts arising from knowledge. As the boy in the story said to his cruel and persecuting father, "You cannot burn out of me the two chapters I learned out of the Bible," so neither can our knowledge be wrested from us.

But the most important knowledge is that which we obtain from the bible respecting God, ourselves, and whatever is interesting to be known. A true knowledge of Him is eternal life, and this life is in his Son, and revealed in the word of truth.—To possess a right knowledge of ourselves and of God, is to lay up treasure in Heaven—a treasure which when possessed in connection with the good things of this life, infinitely exceeds them all in value; and when enjoyed, alone can compensate for the absence of all things else. Permit us, then, to ask our young friends most affectionately whether they are improving the morning of their existence in the acquisition of useful knowledge? Do you prize as you ought the Bible, and the means appointed by the Father of mercies to make you wise unto salvation? Are you sufficiently thankful that your parents instead of persecuting you for reading the Bible encourage you to give all diligence to cultivate an intimate acquaintance with that best of books? And do you properly appreciate the advantages afforded by the Sabbath School, and constantly avail yourselves of them? If you can answer these questions in the affirmative, though you possess none of the riches of this world, you are rich indeed. Rich because your treasure is in heaven, and your life hid with Christ in God. But if, while surrounded by these unspeakable privileges and mercies, you neglect the important things which belong to your peace, how can you meet them at the great day of reckoning? Will not privileges, and parents, and those less favored rise up there and testify to your shame and confusion? Happy—thrice happy will those children be, who, like king David, and Timothy, and the little boy in the story, with all the truly wise, have hid the word of God in their hearts, and regarded it as their best treasure.—EDS.

THE LITTLE SABBATH SCHOLAR.

I heard a minister relate the following in a speech at the anniversary of the Sabbath School Union of the Reformed Dutch Church.

A little boy of a Roman Catholic family near his church, had attended a Sabbath School. In the absence of his bigoted father, he had attended very punctually, and had made wonderful progress. He had earned a Bible by his industry and progress. He had committed to memory two chapters of the Gospel of John. At length his father having gone into his little bedroom, made the alarming discovery, that his boy had a Bible on his table. He summoned him into his presence, and with horrid imprecations, demanded where he had got that bad book,—that Bible!

"I got it at the Sabbath School," said the boy very meekly.—With an oath and a curse he demanded if he attended a Sabbath School. He replied—yes, and that he had committed to memory two pretty and delightful chapters in John.

The enraged parent declared that that Bible should instantly be burned! The boy did his best to prevail with his bigoted father "not to burn his own dear and precious Bible." But it was all in vain. "Well, well then, cried the boy in tears, "but you cannot burn out of me the two chapters which I have committed to memory!"

May we not safely say, that such men as this bigoted enemy of the Bible and divine truth, are just such men as were pointed out by our Savior, who said, that they would "neither enter into the kingdom of heaven themselves, nor allow others that would go in, to enter!" And, alas! are not the votaries of the Roman apostacies given up to this deplorable spirit.—Protestant Vindicator.

Nothing appears more delightful than to see children attentively perusing the columns of the Register to ascertain whether it contains a beautiful story for them.

TH[illegible]ATH AND THE HOUSE OF PRAYER.

How great is the mercy of God in providing these houses of prayer, where two or three may meet together in his name, and find their gracious Lord in the midst of them, saluting them as in the days of his flesh, with his accustomed benedicton, Peace be unto you. What a relief is it to come into these hallowed walls, out of the strife and turmoil of the world, and commit our cause, and our fears, to the care of God. What a comfort to leave behind us, for a brief interval, all the conflicting interests and the entangling devices of this perishable life, and to raise our thoughts to that happier time, when brother shall no longer strive with brother; when none shall hunger or thirst, neither shall the heat nor sun smite them by day, nor the cold by night! What a miserable scene of incessant struggle and worldliness would this land be, without its Sabbath, and its house of prayer! Abused as are these blessings by so many, despised and trodden under foot, and desecrated, as are too often holy things of this house, and of the Lord's own day, they yet shed a light and a religious cheerfulness over this world's scene, even in our imperfect observance of their duties, which those who value Christian privileges prize as their bread of life, and the best sustenance of the soul. They are the salt of our land; they keep alive the fire of religious feeling on the altar of the heart.—They give a respite from earthly cares, and open a glimpse of heaven to our sight.—They speak, as it were, a perpetual protest against vice and infidelity. They set up a standard for the gospel. They oppose a temporary check to the foes of the soul.—They remind man that there is no peace or spiritual prosperity, but through reconciliation with God, and in communion with him.—Dr. Sumner.

FORGIVENESS.

Friend of mine early days return,—
Though sorely thou didst grieve me;
For thee with fond desire I burn,
I freely now forgive thee:
How could I other than forgive,
Since I have been forgiven?
How, but the penitent receive,—
Who mercy found with heaven!

Come to my bosom once again,
And trust me now as ever;
No want of confidence shall pain,—
Distrust no more shall sever:
The tear that glitters in thine eye,
The penitent confession,
Forever purge the stain away,
Atone for the transgression.

The warm affections of the soul,
Awhile pent like a river,
Burst through impatient of control,
And stronger flow than ever;
A brother gained—united is
The tie that once was riven;—
I know no greater joy than this,
But I am loved of heaven. J. G. W.

LOSER OF SOULS.—All they who wrong others to enrich themselves; all that rob upon the highway, pick-pockets, or break open houses; all that forge deeds, forswear themselves or suborn others to do so in lawsuits; all that willingly cheat, defraud, or overreach their neighbors, in buying or selling their goods; all that pilfer and steal, or so much as withhold and conceal what they know belongs to another; all that are able, yet will not pay what they owe, but lie in prison, or hide themselves, or at least pretend they cannot do it; all that smuggle the king's customs, or corrupt his officers, and by that means keep to themselves what the law hath made due to him; all that refuse or neglect to relieve those of their relations or others, which are really in need, and so withhold from them the maintenance which God hath appointed for them; all that oppress and gripe poor workmen in their prices, or servants in the wages which are due to them; all that work upon people's necessities, and extort from them more than the laws of the land allow of; all that follow such unlawful trades as tend to the corrupting of youth, and to the nourishing of vice and wickedness in the world; all that by false weights or measure, by lying, over-reckoning, or by any trick, impose on those they deal with; and all that are conscious to themselves that, by these and such like unlawful ways, they have got other men's money, goods, or estates in their hands, and yet will not restore them again to their right owners as far as they are able: these all as plainly lose their souls for this world as if they should make a solemn contract or bargain with the devil that, upon condition they may have such and such things at present, he shall have their souls forever; for so he will, and leave them in the lurch too; he will serve them in their own kind; as they cheated others he will cheat them, and put them off with nothing but dreams and fancies, instead of the great profit and advantage they expected.

A candidate for admission to Church membership, under the Rev. Rowland Hill, being required to give some account of his first impression as to the evil of sin and the need of the gospel, related a dream, by which he had been affected, and led to serious inquiry, to the hearing of sermons, &c. When he had ended, Mr. Hill said, "We do not wish to despise a good man's dream, by any means; but we will tell you what we think of the dream, after we have seen how you go on when you are awake."

HOW LARGE IS GOD?—An atheist (one who says there is no God) seeing a little girl reading her Bible, said to her, (by way of ridiculing religion,) "well and what kind of a God is yours, is he a large god or a little god?" She replied, "both Sir; he is so large that the heaven of heavens cannot contain him, and so small that he can dwell in my heart."

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, June 16, 1840.

Mr. GEORGE P. MAXSON is a traveling agent for this paper.

The absence of the Editors at the time our paper goes to press, and for a few days previous, rendered necessary in consequence of the Association, will be a sufficient apology for the want of that variety which is usual in the columns of the Register. H.

"Be ye therefore followers of God, as dear children."—ST. PAUL.

How consoling it must be for every true christian to reflect that he has an example set for him to follow whilst wandering through this vale of tears—beset as he is on every side with the allurements and fascinations of the world, and tossed from billow to billow on the wide wavy ocean of time! The christian, of all others, should be strong in his profession, when he reflects upon the important and responsible duties which must necessarily devolve upon him as a follower of God. "Be ye, therefore, followers of God, as dear children." How sublime the expression! How it is calculated to elevate the soul above the low, menial things of Earth! What an example that must be which a God condescends to set for his dear children! Oh, enrapturing thought! and, yet, as christians, do we "follow God, as dear children!" Do we follow him in his ordinances, in his statutes, and in all his requirements? Do we wait upon and follow him in the sanctuary, from Sabbath to Sabbath?—in the Bible class?—in the prayer circle?—in the morning and evening oblations?—Oh we fear, awfully fear, that there is a wide departure from the example given us!

If, then, we are exhorted by a no less distinguished personage than a Paul to "follow God, as dear children," with what deference should we regard the exhortation! It emanates from a worthy source, and we should endeavor to derive all possible benefit therefrom. God, is the way; and if we follow him as dear children, no harm will befall us. He will lead us to those living streams, of which if a man partake he will never thirst. He will lead us to the celestial city, even the New Jerusalem, whose builder and maker is GOD. Yes, if we follow God, he will lead us through the dark valley and shadow of death, and his brightness will mark our path-way.

And what more can the christian ask? What more can the follower of God desire? Does he ask for a crown? Indeed, it is given him, even a crown of life everlasting, which will far outvie that of the most renowned monarch of Eastern Empires. What an encouragement is here held out to us? Astonished more and more, should we be with ourselves when we reflect upon the wide difference there is between our following God as we do, and following him as we ought.

Let us, then, follow God with all lowliness and meekness; with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love, endeavoring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace, well knowing that there is but one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in us all if we truly follow him. H.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Extract from a letter of brother Paul Crandall, to one of the Editors of the Register, under date of NEWPORT, O., May 31, 1840.

There has been a great revival of religion in this place, and many have experienced the pardoning love of God.—Twelve were baptized in the great Western Jordan [the Ohio River] in one day, and others are still coming forward to follow their Lord and Master.

The revival was the result of a union meeting, in which seven denominations were represented—the leading denominations being Baptists and Methodists; all the converts, however, with one exception, are Baptists—in all about 20.

The ill success of our Methodist society has called out their champion in defense of Infant Baptism, Sprinkling, &c., who, failing to establish the point satisfactorily, has procured Professor Allen, of Marietta College, to crush the rapid strides of Bible truth.

There is much enquiry on the subject of the Bible Sabbath, and many have been led to enquire into the evidence of a change; and some have expressed their conviction of the entire absence of such evidence.—Some have expressed a willingness to keep the Sabbath if they were living among those who observed it. There has been no open rupture upon the subject. The enquiry is mostly among the young and has been their theme of conversation. At social meetings and Bible class and teacher's meetings, the seventh-day, I understand, has some open advocates.

To G. M. L.

In order to test the hypothesis of G. M. L., let D=diameter of the sphere whose superfices is equal to the solidity of the shell. Then D—1=diameter of the cavity of the hollow globe by the hypothesis, and D plus 1=diameter of the hollow globe by the question.

Put p=3,14159 &c. Then (D cube plus 3D square plus 3D plus 1) p÷ 6=solid contents of the hollow globe (Young's Int. Calc. Art. 75. p. 140).

And (D cube—3D square plus 3D—1) p÷ 6=solidity of its cavity.

The difference of these expressions, viz: (6D square plus 2) p÷ 6 or pD square plus p÷ 3 must be the solidity of the shell.

Now pD square=superficies of the sphere whose diameter is D (Young's Int. Calc. Art. 71. p. 139,) therefore by the hypothesis pD square plus p÷ 3=pD square, and because the remainders are equal when equals are taken from equals. p÷ 3=0, which is absurd.

N. B. The above expression for the solidity of the shell, furnishes a ready method of finding the diameter of the cavity; for pD square plus p÷ 3=p 8000 cube by the question, from which equation D may be determined and D—1=diameter of the cavity. R. D.

REVIVAL RECORD.

We learn from the Morning Star that the state of religion is yet interesting at Lewiston Falls,—25 have been baptized.

In Richmond, Me., many souls have been converted,—some of them remarkable cases—and others are inquiring the way to Zion. The prospects are said to be still encouraging.

In Saco, Me., the Lord is still smiling in mercy upon his people and the converts appear to be strong in the Lord, and advancing in the Divine Life. Quite a number have been baptized, and the future prospects appear cheering indeed, for a more powerful and extensive work of divine grace.

In Groveland, and Conesus, Livingston co., there appears to be a good degree of interest manifest in the cause, and about 50 have been hopefully converted to God.

In Zanesville, O., about 150 have been added to the two Baptist churches in that place since last December.

In Georgetown, O., 28 have been received into the church on profession of their faith; and to the different churches in that vicinity near 500 have been added.

In Wells, Me., about 40 are indulging a hope, who are the fruits of a late revival.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

From the New York Spectator.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM ENGLAND.

The steamboat Unicorn, the first of Mr. Cunard's line, departed from Liverpool on the appointed day, 16th of May, and arrived at Halifax on Monday the 1st of June, at 11 A. M. and departed again the same evening for Boston, where she arrived on Wednesday evening the third, after a passage of forty hours.

We are indebted to our Halifax correspondents, to the Messrs. Topliff, of Boston, and our English correspondents, for files of London papers to the evening of May 15th, and Liverpool to the 16th, both inclusive.

THE TWO SICILIES.

The quarrel between England and the King of the Two Sicilies has been happily adjusted. In the House of Commons, May 4, Lord Palmerston answered as follows to a question put by Sir Robert Peel.

Lord Palmerston said that the good offices of the French Government for the arrangement of the differences between Her Majesty's Government and that of Naples had been offered some time ago, and had been immediately accepted by her Majesty's Government. At the same time a similar offer had been made by the French Government to the Government of Naples, and it appeared from the latest despatches received, both from Naples and Paris, that that offer had been accepted by the Government at Naples.

Sir R. Peel asked if the order for reprisals had been consequently rescinded.

Lord Palmerston said that it had been agreed as soon as our representative at the Court of Naples should be officially informed of the arrival of any French diplomatist, charged to exercise the good offices of the French Government, he should immediately transmit to the officers commanding her Majesty's ships, instructions to suspend reprisals for a certain time; but from the despatches received to-day he had learned that at the moment when the French mediation had been accepted by the King of Naples, and when, according to the agreement, the reprisals would have been stopped, the Neapolitan Government had laid an embargo on all British vessels in Neapolitan ports and consequently the order for reprisals on the part of the British Government had not been suspended.

Subsequently news arrived that the embargo had been taken off, the order for reprisals was countermanded, and the Neapolitan vessels that had been taken were to be resto[illegible]

THE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

On the 7th of May, Lord John Russell gave his promised explanation, as follows:—

I have some doubt how far it is consistent with my duty to answer the question which the honorable gentleman has just put to me; but no doubt there is considerable anxiety upon the subject, and as papers upon the subject have been published in the United States, I think it would be desirable to give a general outline of the state in which the question at present stands between the United States and this country relative to the Maine boundary. The house will recollect I stated there were two very distinct questions: the one was the general question of the boundary, arising out of the treaty of 1783, and the treaty of Ghent; and the other was with respect to the interpretation of our agreement for the sake of preserving jurisdiction and possession undisturbed by the two parties, made in the course of the spring of 1839.

With respect to the former part of the subject, a proposition was made by my noble friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in the name of the Government last year, and the reply to that was a counter proposition of a totally different nature being made by the Government of the United States. At the same time commissioners were appointed by the Government of Great Britain, who had surveyed the disputed country, and had arrived in this country in January last. Their report was received only a few days ago; it contains matter of very considerable importance, and is now under the consideration of the Government, and an answer will be immediately returned to the last proposition made by the Government of the United States, informing them how far we can fall in with the proposition they last made.

This is the only answer I can give at present upon that branch of the subject. With respect to the question relating to the provisional agreement of last year, it is unfortunate that it is almost entirely upon it that recent difficulties have arisen. The agreement proposed by Gen. Scott, and agreed to by the Governor of Maine, was, that Great Britain should hold the valley of Upper St. John, and Maine that of the Aroostook, without it being conceded that the right was in either. Unfortunately, the agreement did not state the exact position in which the jurisdiction of either party was to remain. That agreement was offered by Gen. Scott on the 21st of March, it was agreed to by Sir J. Harvey on the 23d of March, and by the Government of Maine on the 25th. It afterwards appeared late in the autumn, that the persons belonging to the civil posse of Maine, had advanced into the valley of Upper St. John, and had established themselves in a position where the Fish River falls into the St. John, called the Mouth or Confluence of St. John and the Fish River.

The party which had advanced into the valley of Upper St. John consisted of only twenty or thirty individuals, armed with guns and a field-piece, which they fired off in token of taking possession. In consequence of these proceedings there were remonstrances made by Mr. Fox to the Government of the United States, and it not appearing that there was likely to be any effectual check put to these proceedings, the Governor of the British North American Provinces, in connection with the commander of the forces, has advanced two companies of infantry to a place certainly within the disputed boundary. In the representation made on the part of the United States, there certainly must have been some oversight on the part of the Governor of Maine in his communication to the Secretary of State of the United States, in not adverting to that point, but merely referring to another part of the agreement, in which it was stated that they had done nothing to disturb the Madawaska settlement.

They confined the limits of the Madawaska settlement within a very restricted boundary, while we contend that it extends to the Fish River. (Hear.) However, according to the last accounts received from that country, it does not appear that Maine entertains any intention of going beyond what she has hitherto done. I have been given to understand that such is the opinion entertained on this subject by those on the spot, and I believe it is also the opinion of the Governor of New Brunswick that the two parties will remain in their present position, and there is, I will not say no possibility, but certainly no probability, of any collission taking place between the adverse parties. (Hear, hear.)

Such being the state of affairs it appeared to me to be my duty to write to the Governor of British America, and to the commander of the forces in that country, to state my opinion that it would be exceedingly desirable, if any ambiguity existed in the instrument agreed upon between the Governor of New Brunswick and the Governor of Maine, in order to avoid any collission between the adverse parties, that the exact geographical position at present occupied by each party should be distinctly ascertained and made the foundation of a fresh agreement. Gov. Thompson coincided with me in opinion on this point, and in obedience to my wishes he sent to the American government to make such a proposal, adding, which is a matter of great importance, and of which I entirely approve, a proposition that commissioners should be appointed on each side to see that such agreement should be fairly carried into effect.

Such is an outline of the state of affairs at present between the two countries—no doubt it implies that differences of an unpleasant nature have occurred between the two countries on this question of the boundary; but when I consider how much both countries are interested in the preservation of peace—(hear, hear, and cheers)—the great responsibility that will be incurred by whichever country shall unnecessarily have recourse to hostilities, (cheers,) I trust and believe that peace will not be interrupted, but that the whole will end in a formal and amicable settlement of all existing differences. (Cheers.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer had given notice that, before the close of the session, the expense of the war with China would be brought before the house and a vote taken upon it.

The papers make no farther mention of the "maternal probabilities" of the Queen, and we perceive that her Majesty had resumed her dancing enjoyments, the cessation of which was chiefly relied on as evidence in support of the prevailing rumor.

The Rev. George Grantham, one of the fellows of the Magdalen College, Oxford, was found lying dead under the window of his room. Supposed that he fell out while raising the sash.

The papers announce the death of Judith Grisi, sister of the celebrated Julia, and herself a vocalist of some eminence.

The Queen gave her first state ball since the royal marriage, on the night of May 11. Among the company were Earl Grey, Duke of Wellington, Lord Holland, Sir Robert Peel, Earl of Ripon and Earl of Aberdeen—a curious mingling of political opposites.

The Queen's birth day, May 18, was to be celebrated as a national holyday throughout the kingdom.

The approaching marriage of the Russian Grand Duke to the Princess Mary of Hesse Darmstadt, has been officially announced.

The Spanish General [illegible] died at Lisbon on the 29th of [illegible]

Col. Pasley had fired another of his monstrous charges against the wreck of the Royal George, and with excellent effect.—Among the articles brought up by the explosion were great quantities of candles and some butter.

Among the deaths announced are those of Mr. Morrison, of hygean pill notoriety, and Count Guiccioli, husband of Lord Byron's mistress.

The Lucca Journal states that a petition, signed by numerous European merchants at Alexandria, has been presented to Mehemet Ali, praying that the case of the Jews of Damascus may be called before the tribunal at Cairo, and there fully gone into. It appears that the execution of the Jewish merchants at Damascus, which had been ordered, and had been said to have taken place, had not been enforced by the authorities.

MURDER OF LORD WILLIAM RUSSELL.

The murder of an aged and highly respected nobleman has created a painful sensation in London. On Tuesday morning, Lord William Russell, brother of the late and uncle of the present Duke of Bedford and of Lord John Russell, was found dead in his bed, with his throat cut from ear to ear. The circumstances were detailed at a coroner's inquest held at the residence of the murdered nobleman, in Norfolk st. Park Lane.

Lord William, who was in his seventy third year, rather infirm, and very deaf, lived alone in his house in Norfolk street; his establishment consisting of two female servants and a Swiss valet, who had only been a short time in his service. On Tuesday evening, he dined at home, and retired to his bed room at his usual hour—half past ten. The two women servants went to bed about the same time; the valet sitting up till nearly twelve, when his master's bell summoned him; and he assisted Lord William to undress, saw him get into bed, and by his Lordship's desire lighted a candle and gave him a book. There was nothing extraordinary in Lord William's appearance or manner.

The valet then went to bed. The doors and windows were all fastened. About a quarter before seven on Wednesday morning, Sarah Mancer, the house-maid, got up; and she found the papers in her master's writing room scattered about. His opera-glass, cloak, and some other articles of dress, were in the hall wrapped up as if ready to be carried off. The plate in the pantry was all "lying about," and some of it taken; so there was no doubt a robbery had been committed. She went up stairs and called the valet, who was almost dressed having only his coat to put on. He ran down stairs, and said, "Some person has been robbing: for God's sake, go and see where his Lordship is." They went into Lord William's room, and found him lying on his back, his head nearly severed from his body, and the clothes soaked with his blood.

Courvoisier, the Swiss valet was arrested, and his examination was still in progress. The facts elicited, pointed strongly to him as the perpetrator of the murder.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

May 14.—The annual meeting of the London Missionary Society was held today in the great room, Exeter Hall. The meeting was one of the most crowded of the season, the hall being filled in every corner with ladies, and the platform with gentlemen. Sir George Gray, Bart., took the chair. The number of the Society's missionary stations is at present 361; the number of missionaries one hundred & fifty six; & the number of assistants native and English, in foreign parts, 451. During the past year 28 new missionaries have been sent out with their wives and families. The number of the Society's churches is at present 109. The number of communicants 9,966; and the number of scholars 41,752. The receipts for the year have £91,119 12s. 10d.; and the expenditure £82,197 0s. 4d. It was announced by Mr. Garthwait that the munificent sum of £10,000 had been made over and placed in trust for the Society by a resident in the manufacturing districts, who most nobly gave this splendid donation anonymously. It was also stated by the same gentleman that two farms in Lancashire had been made over to the society, and the annual proceeds, amounting to £200, secured to the funds. Two of the directors present gave £100 each, and the treasurer the like handsome sum. The boxes were handed round during the meeting, and a very large sum collected. One individual put £20 in the box.

FRANCE

In the Chamber of Deputies on the 12th of May, the minister of the Interior announced that the King had commanded his son, the Prince de Joinville, to go to the island of St. Helena, and convey to France the remains of the Emperor Napoleon. On this event the Journal des Debates remarks as follows:—

"Who would have said 25 years ago, when England was directing against France the whole of Europe, the day was so near at hand when these two nations reconciled by a new revolution, would rely upon each other for the maintenance of the peace of the world, so long disturbed by their quarrels? Who would have thought that England, anxious to efface a sad remembrance from its annals, would have expressed its desire that the restoration of the ashes of Napoleon might become the pledge of the permanent reconciliation of the two nations? The alliance with England is still farther consolidated by [illegible]. In vain do diplomatists [illegible] they are not ratified in the hearts of the people. We may now, however, believe, to use the noble expression of the British Government, that if some sentiments of animosity still exist between the two countries, they will [illegible] in the tomb in which the ashes of Napoleon are to be deposited."

[illegible] of the most interesting articles to be found in the journals before us, is an announcement by La Presse, that the British and French commissioners had at last agreed on the basis of a commercial treaty between Great Britain and France. According to La Presse, 'France is to increase her import duties on linen and linen yarn, and to remove the prohibition now existing against the importation of fine ironmongery, stone pottery, a few articles of woolen manufacture, and various small objects of ordinary consumption, substituting for that prohibition an elevated scale of duties."

In return for these concessions, which will be duly appreciated, "England is to reduce from 30 to 15 per cent the import duties on all the articles of Parisian production, on clocks, watches, and on the stained and dyed paper. She will reduce the import duty on French wines from 5s 6d per gallon to 2s per gallon, and that on brandy from 22s to 14s per gallon." 'Thus,' says La Presse, "our wines will pay only an import duty of 8 or 9 sous in England, while the customs duty on its entry into Paris is 6 sous; and we may hope to furnish for British consumption good vin ordinaire at 1f 25c (1s) a bottle." "The import duties on silks are to be those demanded by the city of Lyons."

SPAIN.

Letters from Barcelonia state that the Carlists were flying in all directions; that Diego Leon continued to occupy Mora del Ebro with 11 battallions and five squadrons. He was engaged in re-establishing the communications between the two banks of the river, and cutting them off from the Carlist forces.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

No change appears to have taken place in the question between these two powers, and indeed Lord Palmerston declared in the House of Commons that matters remained in statu quo.

In Turkey the good work of reform was vigorously pressed forward. A proof of the sincerity of the Sultan was recently afforded in the deposition of Akiff Pacha from the government of Nicomedia, on the complaint of the inhabitants that he was cruel and exacting.

CHINA.

Bombay letters of March 31, announce that preparations for the Chinese expedition were in progress, on a most extensive scale. Singapore was the place, and the 7th of May the time, for the general muster.

The Supreme Court of Calcutta had decided that the scrip issued by Captain Elliott, for the opium surrendered to him, was issued under constraint of a foreign power—that his acts were therefore invalid, and that his certificates were good for nothing.

It is reported that the cholera has again broken out in the East Indies. At Bombay, it is said, thirty had been attacked with it, almost simultaneously.

SUMMARY.

Another Producer.—The Great Western, Capt. Walker, returned from Chicago to Buffalo a few days since, with an immense number of passengers, 3,000 bushels of wheat, and 200 barrels of flour. The grain was taken in at Chicago and is the product of Illinois, and a portion of the flour is from Wisconsin, and is the first ever exported from that territory. It was manufactured at Perkin's Mills, Racine. A townsman writing from Racine, under date of May 29, says: "There will be a surplus of wheat this season to be shipped at this port, of from fifty to one hundred thousand bushels."

Emigration.—One hundred and eighty four Germans passed through Syracuse a few days since, wending their way to the far west.

Commodore Elliott.—The trial of Commodore Elliott has been in progress for a number of days, at the last dates, was still pending.

Two thirds of the growing Cotton on the Mississippi has been covered, and the river was still swelling, according to late accounts.

Flour.—Genesee Flour was selling in New York on the 10th inst. at $4,69 per barrel, with a good demand.

Expenditures.—The expenditures of the U. S. Government for the year 1839, were $37,129,396 80.

Benjamin Rathbun.—His Excellency, Wm. H. Seward, has refused to grant a pardon to Bejamin Rathbun, who, our readers are doubtless aware, has been confined in the State Prison at Auburn for some two or three years. The Governor, in a very lucid and able manner, gives his reasons for refusing to grant the favors of several thousand citizens of this State.

John Alexander, alias Jefferson, has been arrested at Baltimore, charged with having caused the death of Thomas Laughlin.

Patent Locks.—A Mr. Jones, of Newark, N. J., has invented and manufactured a Lock, which promises to set at defiance all the skill and efforts of Pick-Locks.

Orphan Asylum.—The Catholic Ladies of Washington held a fair a few days since, for the benefit of St. Vincents' Orphan Asylum, the receipts of which amounted to $2,257.

Census of Lowell.—The census just completed of Lowell, Mass., exhibits a population of 20,981, of whom 7,341 are males, and 13,640 females.

Rev. Moses H. Wilder was installed pastor of the Presbyterian church in Georgetown, Ohio, on the 14th ultimo, by the Presbytery of Ripley.

Spurious Bills.—The public are cautioned against receiving bills purporting to be of the GLOBE BANK, at New York—no such institution being in existence.

The Georgia Freshet appears to have been very general in the northern and western part of the state. We are happy to learn, however, just as our paper goes to the press, that the waters are abating, and fearful apprehensions of further damage are subsiding.

Fires in New York.—We learn from the Commissioner's Report that, during the year ending on the 23d ultimo, 192 fires occurred in the city of New York. Of this number 96 were caused, in the opinion of the commissioners, by incendiarism. The value of property destroyed by fire during the year is THREE MILLIONS, TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIVE THOUSAND, FOUR HUNDRED AND NINE DOLLARS!

The following is the cost per mile of several of the most important railroads in the United States, now in operation:

Boston and Worcester,	$37,000
Boston and Providence,	42,000
Norwich and Worcester,	22,000
Western Railroad,	34,000
New Jersey Railroad,	45,000
Camden and Amboy,	40,000
Columbia and Philadelphia,	40,000

Utica and Schenectady,	19,000
Stonington,	52,000
Hartford and New Haven	20,900

The State of Connecticut is free from debt, and has in the treasury the sum of $18,514.

The Conecticut school fund amounts to $2, 040,000. The dividend made last year, was 103,345, which was appropriated among 82,676 children.

The number of convicts in the Connecticut State prison 169; and the profits of their labor beyond expenses the past year are $4500. The warden has cash on hand exceeding $9000,

The militia of Connecticut amount to 40,000. well organized and equiped—better disciplined probably than the militia of any other State of the Union.

The old custom of an annual election sermon is discontinued in Connecticut, and will be revived, only when respect for the memory of our Puritan fathers shall have triumphed over the degenerate spirit of the passing times.—Boston Recorder.

Auburn and Rochester Rail-Road.—We notice, by reference to the annual report of the directors, made on the 1st inst., that the completion of this road has been somewhat retarded, owing to the general embarrassments of the country. That part between Rochester and Canandaigua (29 miles) is about three-fourths finished, and is expected to be put in operation by September next; the whole road may be ready for use in July, 1841. The cost for construction is estimated at $1,124,710 26, or about $14,000 per mile; and the revenue per annum at $361,517 50. The length of this road is about the same as that of the Utica and Schenctady. Eighteen months from this time will probably furnish us with an uninterrupted rail-road communication from Portland to Buffalo.

Wesleyan Missionary Society.—The anniversary of the Wesleyan Missonary Society was held in Exeter Hall, London, on the 4th of May. The Rev. Dr. S. Bunting commenced the proceeding, and afterward introduced Sir Peter Laurie, who took the chair and made an admirable address. The annual report was read by the Rev. John Beecham. From this document we learn that—

The principle or central mission stations occupied by the society in the various parts of the world now enumerated, are about 240. The missionaries are 362, besides catechists, local preachers, assistants, superintendents of schools, schoolmasters and mistresses, artizans, &c. of whom upward of 390 are employed at a moderate salary, and 3350 afford their services gratuitously. The number of communicants on the mission stations, according to the latest return, is 78,228, being an increase of 5578 on the number reported last year. This total does not include the number under the care of the missionaries in Ireland. The number of the scholars in the mission schools is 53,703.

Dr. Bunting presented the financial condition of the society. The total income the past year was £92,697, being an increase of £7,879—the expenditure was £104,-017.

The following legacies by Mrs. Lee have been recently paid by her Executors:

PRESBYTERIAN GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

The new school Presbyterian General Assembly closed their session on Friday. They are hereafter to meet but once in three years. On the last day of the session, as we learn from the Commercial Advertiser, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, it appears from memorials that have been sent to this house, that several presbyteries have passed resolutions excluding slave-holders from their pulpit and from their communion; and whereas our constitution requires that no member of the Presbyterian church shall be thus disfranchised without a regular trial and conviction; and whereas this proceeding is a repetition of the exscinding acts of the new basis Assembly, against which (acts) we have taken our stand as friends of the constitution; therefore

Resolved, That the said Presbyteries be requested to recind such resolutions.

Whereas this General Assembly have had many and difficult questions to discuss, and those of an exciting nature; and whereas the Assembly has arrived at two important conclusions, viz:

1. That any subject of moral import may be discussed without necessarily producing divisions in the Assembly; and

2. That the Assembly can not constitutionally agitate or adjudicate upon any subject unless that subject shall be presented under the legitimate sanction of the constitution of our church; therefore

Resolved, That we record our thanks to Almighty God for conducting us as an assembly to the close of our session in so much peace and good will, in all the circumstances and difficulties in which we were placed.

The first of these resolutions was passed almost unanimously, and the last nem. con.

The old school General Assembly, on Friday, adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Presbytery of Newburyport, having virtually seperated from us, are not any longer recognized as a constituent part of the Presbyterian church of the United States, and that the Synod of Albany be requested to remove their name from its roll.

An act relating to the conveyance of Land in Michigan—Passed March 31, 1840.—Section 2. That lands or tenements lying in Michigan, may be conveyed by the owners thereof, though residing in any other State or Territory, by deed, executed according to the laws of such State or Territory, with a certificate of the proper County Clerk, under the seal of his office, that such deed is executed according to the laws of such State or Territory, attached to such deed.

FROM FLORIDA.

ST. AUGUSTINE, May 24.

To-day was a sad time in our city. The funeral of two victims of the relentless violence of the Indians took place, who were murdered yesterday within seven miles of the city on the Picolata road. Mr. Forbes of the Savannah Theatre, intending to give a series of dramatic entertainments, arrived in town on Friday evening, and a carriage and wagon were dispatched that night to Picolata to forward on the remainder of his company. In these conveyances, besides a portion of the theatrical corps, was Mr. Burnet, of Savannah, and Mr. Miller, of Brunswick, Ga. The party had traveled on as far as the eight mile post in safety, when suddenly they were fired upon by a large party of Indians, who were concealed close to the road. The mules being attacked took fright, and ran with the vehicles from the road, the occupants making every effort to escape.—Messrs. Burnet, Miller, and a German musician attached to Mr. Forbes's company, fell beneath their murderous fire. The black driver, Abraham, took the road toward Fort Searle, followed by a young gentleman of the company, and succeeded in reaching the fort. Mr. Lyon succeeded in reaching a hammock, and Mr. Hagan, the white driver, effected his retreat, and secreted himself in a high growth of palmettos.

A wagon belonging to the United States had been sent that morning from the quarter master's department for Picolata, driven by a negro, and carrying out Mr. Francis Medecis, of this place, and Mr. Alonzo Ball, a carpenter, who has been some time living among us. This wagon proceeded seven miles in safety, when it was fired upon. The negro driver succeeded in escaping, running into the military station at the six-mile post, and gave the alarm. Mr Ball was killed, and Mr. Medecis ran some distance up the road and was intercepted by another party, and he was killed. A horse was furnished the negro driver, who rode into town and reported the circumstances.

A sergeant and six men only, occupying this last mentioned post, turned out on the alarm, and saw the Indians advancing upon them. They were in number 21, and, approaching within a very close range, the sergeant withdrew his men into the pickets, and the Indians retreated.

On information reaching this place, several gentlemen saddled up, and on reaching the spot, a truly melancholy spectacle presented itself. The mutilated remains of those so late in the bloom and vigor of manhood, were now discovered blackened and disfigured by horrible mutilation. The contents of the wagons were strewn in all directions, and one of Col. Hanson's horses cut in the most barbarous manner.

The gentlemen then formed themselves into a company, & placed themselves under Capt. Blake, of 2d dragoons, who had volunteered on the occasion—leaving six of their number to hunt up and gather the dead, as well as search for any who might have escaped; they proceeded on the trail. It was followed under considerable disadvantage some 15 or 18 miles, until night closed upon this scout near Turnbull's swamp, whither the trail led. It being now perfectly dark, the scout returned to town at 10 o'clock at night. Lieut Ord, in command of Fort Searle, on learning of the news, immediately proceeded to the ground with six men, and made every exertion to find the missing men—he then proceeded to his post, and taking four day's rations, started in another direction in pursuit.—The persons escaping, all succeeded in reaching town on Sunday night.—N. O. News.

Horrible Murder of Six Persons.—On Saturday last, within two miles of Shirleysburg, Huntingdon co., a series of murders were committed, which, for atrociousness, have scarcely a parallel on record. No less than six human beings were hurried from time to eternity, by the hand of a cold blooded murderer, viz:—a Mrs. Brown, and her five children, from the age of 21 to 10 years. The old lady was found with her throat cut—the son aged 21, and the daughter about 16, with rifle balls through their bodies—the three younger ones, with their brains knocked out with stones, in a field hard by the dwelling-house—supposed to have fled on witnessing the butchery of their mother, &c. Mr. Brown was from home, and on his return a short time after his family were murdered, was fired at twice from the barn, the last ball taking effect, ranging along the lower jaw and passing through the ear. He was stunned but did not fall. At the moment of receiving the second fire, he saw a man jump from the barn loft and make for the woods. This man he believed to be his own son-in-law, by name, Canaughy.

On this suspicion, or rather strong belief, Canaughy was arrested, and the testimony taken before the examining and committing magistrate, went to fix guilt strongly upon him. It appears Brown, the father-in-law, owns a farm worth three or four thousand dollars. Canaughy, the morning of the murders, started with his wife for the residence of his mother, some miles distant in the mountains. He had contrived, however, before starting, to procure the return to the father's residence of the son and daughter, who were absent aiding a neighbor, not far distant, in his field labors, by coining a plausible story, so that his motive for the deed might be made fully and effectually available. Had he succeeded in destroying the father-in-law, his (Canaughy's) wife, the only survivor would have inherited the estate. This was, undoubtedly the moving cause of the hellish deed. In addition, it was in evidence, he had borrowed his father-in-law's two rifles, and they were found in the barn from whence the murderer fled. Canaughy was arrested, in bed, at his mother's residence the same night. He denies but there is little doubt of his guilt. The community in the neighborhood of this transaction, is greatly excited.—Phila. Spirit of the Times.

A fight with an Indian.—The St. Augustine News of the 22d May, relates the following instance of bravery which was manifested a few days before, during a scout by Capt. Holmes, of the 7th infantry.

"Captain Holmes had secreted a portion of his company in such a place as it was probable the enemy might pass, and proceeded onward with the rest of his command, in order to hunt them up. The ambushed party had not lain long in their hiding place, when a few Indians were seen approaching, unconscious of their proximity to the white men. On nearing more closely, the anxiety of a recruit being most intense, was with difficulty defeating the object in view. At this moment, a deer sprang from its covert, and passing a few feet from his gun, the temptation was too great, and the recruit fired. Alarmed at the report, the enemy ran, and the Sergeant, with his command, mounted their horses and gave pursuit.

The Sergeant soon overtook a large and very athletic Indian and dismounting, deliberately levelled his gun within a few feet of his breast, and pulled the trigger. The gun missed fire, and the red skin now levelled his rifle, and lo! the flint refused its duty. Dashing his musket to the earth, the Sergeant sprang to grapple his enemy, but was felled by the club end of his rifle. Rising he used the breach of the gun with good effect; but was repeatedly felled by the greater strength of his foe. Victory hanging now in a doubtful posture, he managed while his head was receiving a succession of tremendous blows, to "fix his bayonet," and made a charge upon the Herculean Seminole. Doubt was at an end; the warrior took to his heels, and sought a tree. There dodging a direct thrust of his instrument, he managed to hold the anger of the Sergeant at bay, until the balance of the command came up; who disposed to see a "fair fight," formed a circle around the combatants. All hope was now cut off; and with a desperate valor he fought, the Sergeant thrusting his bayonet through him, leaving him dead at his feet.

PIRACY AND MURDER.

Letters were received in the city yesterday, from Havana, giving the details of a late and horrid act of piracy, and the capture of the pirates. The letters are dated the 22d inst., and they state that the British brig Vernon, commanded by Captain Cunningham, bound from Falmouth to Halifax, off Cape Antonio, when eight days out, was fired at and brought to by an open boat with a crew and seven men. These men stated they were government officers, and commanded Captain Cunningham to bring his paper and accompany them to the revenue cutter to which they belonged, which they represented to be stationed behind a distant point of the Island. Captain Cunningham ordered out his boat, and with three men followed the villians who were leading him to destruction. When out of sight of the brig, the seven pirates boarded Captain Cunningham's boat, and before their design could be anticipated, their murderous work was accomplished. The Captain's throat was cut and two of his men instantly murdered and thrown into the sea. The third man escaped and reached the Island by swimming, where for five days he wandered alone, until he fell in with Don Antonio, the Captain of a Spanish drogher, called Fauro. Upon relating his story, this captain called together his men, and by a well laid stratagem succeeded in capturing the pirates, who were found stripping the brig upon another part of the Island.

San Antonio is said to be covered with torn sails and other remnants of vessels supposed to have fallen into the hands of pirates, and the details set forth in the letters are horrifying in the extreme. The desperate men who are taken are well secured, and will be sent to Havana for trial. These are the facts as related to us yesterday, and although no confirmation of the dreadful intelligence is yet received, we fear there is little hope but the whole story is true.

The unfortunate man who wandered about the Island, states that blocks, ropes, old sails, casks, and numerous other appurtenances of sea craft, were to be seen in all directions, and the place looked like an old resort for an established gang of pirates. The men who are taken have been recognized as reckless and abandoned characters, who have been known before without occupation or resources, and one who was present at their examination, depicts the whole affair in language most terrible and appalling.—New Orleans Picayune.

The Freshet.—The plantations on the Ogechee, as far as we can learn, are under water. Some planters estimate the loss of their crop at two thirds. We trust that their estimate will prove extravagant. The water was on Saturday within two feet of the bridge, and the Southern stage had to be brought over on a flat.—Charleston Patriot. June 3.

Fatal Accident.—We are pained to learn that Miss Sarah Kennedy, daughter of Mr. Dennis Kennedy, of Lysander, and sister of Mrs. Dorastus Kellogg, of this village, aged about 22 years, was thrown from a one horse wagon on Friday last, and so seriously injured as to cause her death in about 48 hours. She was on her way accompanied by her mother and a young lad, to Fulton, Oswego county, and in descending the hill near that village, the horse became restive and unmanageable. In falling, her clothes caught fast in the forward part of the vehicle, and in this manner, with her head dragging upon the ground, and in contact with one of the wheels, she was drawn about nineteen rods. She was dreadfully mutilated, and remained insensible until she expired. Truly, "in the midst of life we are in death."—Skaneateles Columbian.

Narrow Escape from Lightning.—During a thunder storm in the afternoon of the 24th ult., the house of Mr. C. Butterfield, in Auburn Township, Pa., was struck by lightning, which passed down through to the basement, where a young woman, daughter of Mr. B. was engaged at ironing, having the flat iron at the moment hanging down in her hand by her side. It passed down her arm to the iron, and thence to her foot, and though severely hurt, we understand she is in a fair way to recover.—Montrose Register.

The Law of Love.—In 1647, the General Court of Massachusetts enacted, that if any young man attempted to address any young woman, without the consent of her parents, or, in case of their absence, of a neighboring magistrate of the County Court, he should be fined £5 for the first offense, £10 for the second, and imprisonment for the third. In 1660, Capt. D'l Blake was fined the first named sum, but let off for £4, conditionally, "for making love to Edmund Bridge's daughter, without her parent's consent."

Canal Tolls. The amount of tolls received on all the New York State Canals in the fourth week in May, is $80,964,85, and in the whole month of May, $253,954, 37.

Professor Espy has taken his departure for England.—Post.

CLEAR THE WAY!

I am here Myself among the Rest.

THE subscriber still keeps "digging" away at Bureaus, Tables, Stands, and Bedsteads, and sometimes makes other work that folks want; but he don't think it best to go into a bill of particulars. POETRY.

THE SABBATH.

SABBATH MORNING.

Hail, holy day! The opening light of morn
Streams up the azure sky, and clothes the east
In hues like blush of bursting rose; the lawn
Lies stretched in quiet rest—the sea hath ceas'd
Its troubled roar, and Tumult's voice is still.
Wide forests lift their heads in upright pride,
High mountains rear their lofty peaks, that fill
The void of heaven, and mighty rivers glide
Along their winding course with noiseless flow;
A spirit moves o'er earth; the deep blue sea
Gives forth its voice; the green-clad valleys know
The soft response; the mounts, cloud-top'd & free,
All join; and man—God's latest work and best,
With reverent awe replies, "Let all things rest."

SABBATH NOON.

The deep-toned organ peal is echoing loud
With rapturous swell, and solemn anthems rise
In cadence sweet, far sounding up the skies,
Sweet & more sweet as 't sinks away! The crowd
Of humble worshipers are lowly bowed,
And holy prayer and praise mount up to heaven,
As they were flames of purest incense, given
From out some angel's censer; no dark cloud
Of worldly passion frowneth there, no storm
Of angry strife; each contrite soul is warm
With Jesus' love! The Holy Ghost hath passed
Within those sacred walls, the cup and bread
Are there, and perfect peace on all is shed—
Fit type of Sabbath rest in heaven at last!

SABBATH EVENING.

How beautiful! The fading light of day
Is lingering yet on forest, field, and sea,
And now the temple's spire shines dazzlingly,
While parting sun-beams round its summit play,
As 't were a shaft of burnished gold! The lay
Of evening zephyrs comes upon the ear
So delicately soft, I think I hear
Some seraph-tones symphonious die away,
While Nature chants her Sabbath-vesper hymn!
And now the red light passes; & the skies are dim
Above the west; night's sable veils unroll,
And new born stars the sleeping waters kiss!
Oh, be like this my closing day; like this
My final rest—the Sabbath of the soul!

MISCELLANEOUS.

From the Religious Herald.

WHAT IS USEFUL EDUCATION?

We put the question in reference to the great body of American youth who are to earn their bread by the sweat of their brows, and, under Providence, to wield the future destinies of our country. Two principles should be aimed at: To provide themselves honorably, under any ordinary contingencies—and qualify them to become useful to society. The times, as well as universal experience, abundantly admonish us, that however the children of wealth may indulge in indolence and dissipation, while their means last—the great mass of American youth must, and ought, to depend on their labor for their fortunes and their usefulness. Fortune is at best precarious—patrimonial dependance is uncertain, and reliance upon the friendship or charity of the world, or upon office, is frail and often debasing.—Self-dependance is the only sure stay. We are ever most willing to help those who help themselves. Productive labor is the legitimate source of all the wealth, individual and national—and this labor is profitable to the individual and to the nation in proportion to the measure of intelligence and scientific knowledge which guides and directs its operations. Hence it is of primary importance that our youth should be efficiently taught to labor, and that their minds should be early imbued with that kind of knowledge which will instruct them in the principles of their business, render it honorable, and make them independent in conduct and in fortune.

We have, to be sure, colleges and academies, more than can be well supported, or than can be made economical and useful. But these are in a measure consecrated to the learned professions—to the privileged few—for they are privileged, inasmuch as they are the exclusive recipients of public bounty in the higher branches of learning. Productive labor derives little or no advantage from their teaching. Few of the youth who enter their halls, ever seek for a livelihood in the laboring arts. They learn to look upon labor as servile and demeaning, and to seek their living in what they consider the higher classes of society. They do not go to these schools to learn to work or to learn to live by work—in the common use of these terms—but learn to live without work or above work. They are virtually withdrawn from the producing classes. These young aspirants flock to the learned professions, and genteel employments, as the avenues to honor and office; and notwithstanding the laborer is taxed heavily, in one way or another, to supply their real or imaginary wants, yet the genteel professions have become overstocked, and the threshhold of power so thronged with applicants, that hundreds and thousands are thrown back, as parasites upon society, exhibiting the melancholy spectacle of men, born to be useful, but unable or unwilling, from the bias of a wrong education, to become so. Had these men been taught to look upon labor as it truly is, a necessary, healthful, independent, and honorable employment, and been instructed in its principles and practice while young, they would have cherished its interests, respected its virtues, and cheerfully shared in its toils and its pleasures. We seek not, by these remarks, to pull down that which is, but to build that which is not. It is not that we love a part less, but the whole more. We would raise the standard of labor, without depressing that of literature.

We have common schools too, munificently endowed, where all may acquire the elements of knowledge, but the rudiments only. They teach nothing of the sciences which are necessary to the success in prosecution of the arts—and give no instruction for the best models of practice. They neither learn the boy how to provide for himself, nor fit him fo: extensive usefu'ness. They lay the foundation, but they do little to build up and beautify the temple.

Who will tell us that classic schools, available only to those who design to live without labor, are made the special and exclusive objects of legislative bounty, in regard to the higher branches of instruction? Why is it, that six or seven thousand youth, which is about the number in our colleges and academies, should receive gratuities from the public treasury, till the aggregate exceed three millions, to enable them to live without work, while half a million of other youth, with like capacities, and like claims, destined to labor, and to augment the resources, the wealth, and the happiness of their country, are denied a miserable pittance in the higher branches of knowledge to qualify them for their more important duties in society? Is not knowledge as beneficial to the arts of labor as it is to the learned profession? Is it not as efficiently and beneficially applied in developing the riches of the earth, in perfecting the mechanic and manufacturing arts, and in augmenting the products and profits of labor generally, as it is in the warfare of party politics, in the chicanery of the law, and in prolonging unprofitable debate in legislative halls? May not natural science be as profitably studied and applied on the farm, where nature is constantly presenting new subjects of illustration and application, as in the town or in the closet? Is not chymistry, which instructs in the nature and properties of all bodies, as useful to farmers, in ascertaining the qualities of his soils, and their adaptation to particular crops, and in regulating the multifarious operations of husbandry—and to the artisan, in managing his various processes, as it is to the lawyer, the statesman, or the divine? There is probably no employment in life that embraces so wide a scope of useful study as that of cultivating the soil. The great use and end of science, are to improve art, to impress us with a sense of our obligations to God, and our duty to man. In truth, science belongs to, and continues an integral portion of the arts, and cannot be divorced from them without throwing us back into a state of semi-barbarianism, such as now disgraces a great portion of the population of the old continent. Why then teach science exclusively to the few, who have comparatively so little use for it, and withhold it from the many, to whom it would be a help and a guide.

We look to Europe for precedents, and blindly adopt those that are prejudicial as well as many that are good. We forget that we are a new people in government, manners and law, and that there is no country that will serve, as ours, a model in all cases. The education bestowed upon the working classes in Europe, is designed to qualify them for the subordinate stations in society—for labor and obedience as subjects. Their governments recognise a privileged class—who are the owners of the soil, and live upon the labors of the many. The working classes have very little to do with the affairs of government. Here all are professedly upon a footing of equality. All enjoy political rights, and have political duties to perform—and all should be equally favored, so far as the public bounty is dispensed in the means of obtaining useful knowledge, and of acquiring wealth and honors. We should take care to have good farmers and good mechanics, as well as good lawyers and good doctors. We want not only good subjects, but intelligent freemen—high-minded, independent freemen, who know their rights, and knowing, dare maintain them. We wish to keep the fountain pure, that the stream of power may not become defiled. We wish to base our political and social fabric upon a rock, steadfast and sure—upon the intelligence, industry, and moral rectitude of the great working community. When this class shall cease to exert a healthful and controling influence in political affairs, our boasted freedom will be at an end. A privileged class, whom the bounty of government has assisted to arm with exclusive power, will control and direct the political machine, as may best subserve their aggrandizing views, with regard to the common weal. Ambition is the same in all ages and countries. Man loves power, and is corrupted by it—and in its prolonged exercise the servant will ever swell into the master.—Our freedom can only be securely unguarded by the vigilance of an enlightened, independent, prosperous yeomanry.

Men have tried all sorts of expedients, for thousands of years, to obtain wealth and happiness; and after all it has become pretty evident, that there is no course that wears so well, that is so self-approving, that is so certain in its success, that gives so much health, contentment, and independence—the substantial elements of happiness—as habitual industry, tempered and directed by a cultivated mind, be it in the learned or laboring profession. The consciousness that we are not only providing for ourselves and those naturally dependent upon us, but that we are doing good to society, and thereby fulfiling one of our highest moral obligations, is a rich source of enjoyment, in which the indolent and dissipated must ever remain utter strangers.

We say, therefore, that we want schools of moral, industrious and scientific instruction, for the working classes of society, and that their establishment would conduce alike to the prosperity of the country, and to the perpetuity of our political and religious freedom.

Christian Cheerfulness.—"If good people," said Archibishop Usher, "would but make goodness agreeable, and smile instead of frowning in their virtue, how many would they win to the good cause."

There are two things which ought to teach us to think but meanly of human glory; the very best have had their calumniators, the very worst their panegyrists.

EFFECT OF SCIENCE ON REVELATION.

As long as science shall continue to influence the development of intellect, the beauty and majesty of the sacred writings must be at every perusal more appreciated. Since astronomy has opened to our vision the sunlight system of the universe, how much more sublime is that verse, "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handy work!" Since the telescope has changed the sparkling diamonds of night into rolling spheres, where perhaps intelligent beings like ourselves send up their anthems of adoration to the Father of Creation, how much vaster, how much grander is that expression, "Day unto day uttereth speech; and night unto night sheweth knowledge." We no longer gaze on the stars as but mere ornaments on the wide arch that walls in the world. We see them as globes composing system on systems—having centres around which they fall into abysses where no eye but God's alone has glanced—and those centres, in their turn, moving around suns, whose attendant worlds only then sparkling in the "suburbs of creation." Take this thought in connection with the passage, "As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my thoughts higher than your thoughts," and how glorious, how overpowering to the reflecting mind are the words of the sacred writer.

Since geology has opened to the gaze the shining crystal, the caverned torrents, the diamond-paved recesses and the submarine volcanoes of the world—how much more forcible are many passages of the holy writ. And chemistry, too, standing up in the great laboratory of nature, flashes light on many a sacred line.

Eloquence can do much—but science holds the brightest torch over the "World" of the Almighty. When she suspends her lamp over creation, we see an immense stage on which God has been acting, and performing his wonders for ages not to be computed by the most powerful of angelic intelligence—a stage whose area is infinitude, whose acts occupy eternity. How could the Chaldean shepherd, who watched the midnight stars, and thought them only objects that controlled the destinies of poor little man—how could the Egyptian who scanned the upper worlds from his pyramid, for the purpose of weaving, from their mystic movements, a creed by which he could govern his countrymen—how could the Greek, who made the constellation animals—we say how could these have the same admiration and soul-absorbing love and reverence for the Deity as we, who see the genius of science disclosing to the eye, by every motion of her touch, new beauty in our revelation?

Then let us ponder on our advantages—let us encourage that which will make us feel a deep awe for the Divine intelligence.

There is, I may well say, no wealth, there is no power, there is no rank, which I would accept, if in exchange I were to be deprived of my books, of the privilege of conversing with the greatest minds of all past ages, of searching after truth, of contemplating the beautiful, of living with the distant, the unreal, the past and the future. Knowing, as I do, what it is to enjoy these pleasures myself, I do not grudge them to the laboring men, who, by their honorable, independent, and gallant efforts, have advanced themselves within their reach; and owing all that I owe to the soothing influences of literature, I should be ashamed of myself, if I grudged the same to them.

FOR THE FARMER.

REMARKS ON THE GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF HUSBANDRY.

1. Whatever may be the nature of your soil, and situation of your farm, remember that there is no soil, so good, but it may be exhausted, and ruined by bad tillage, and that there is none so bad, that cannot be rendered fertile by good tillage; even heath, if it can but be ploughed and swarded.

2. The true art of husbandry consists in suffering no crop to grow upon your land, that will so far exhaust your soil, as to lessen the value of your succeeding crop, whatever profit such a crop may afford you.

3. To avoid this, suffer no one crop to grow two years successively, upon the same piece of ground, except grass and buckwheat, without the fertilizing aid of rich manures to support the strength of the soil; and even then, a change of crops will generally do best, except onions, carrots and hemp.

4. Every plant derives from the earth for its growth such properties as are peculiar to itself; this plant when followed successively for two or more years upon the same ground, will exhaust the soil of those properties peculiar to itself, without lessening its powers to produce some other plants; this fact is most striking in the article of flax, which will not bear to be repeated oftener than once in seven years, and is common to all crops, with the exception of those noticed as above.

5. To avoid this evil, arrange your farm into such divisions as will enable you to improve all the variety of crops your land may require, in such a regular succession, as to form a routine of 5, 6, or 7 years, according to the nature, quality, and situation of your farm.

6. This method will make poor land good, and good better. Try and see.—Farmer's Cabinet.

LUCERNE, OR FRENCH CLOVER.

Lucerne, sometimes called "French Clover," is a kind of grass, which, in some situations in Europe, is cultivated with great advantage, and has been tried in some instances with great success in this country. It is not strickly speaking a clover, though in some respect similar. It is perennial—in favorable soils, the roots are said to live and flourish a hundred years.—Its advantages consist in affording a greater amount of foliage for any kind of stock, than any other plant, according to the expense of producing it. Several years since while residing in the state of Maine, we made several experiments with Lucerne, which, although some of them terminated unfavorably, satisfied us that the most favorable soil for it is a deep sandy loam: and as the alluvial soils on this river are generally of this character, we last spring resolved on giving it a trial here. We procured from Boston, a small quantity of seed, which was sown on the river "bottom" the last week in May. As the soil had been badly managed for several years previous, we had feared that the great growth of weeds would check and smother the Lucerne, and to guard against this, and get a chance to extirpate the weeds, we sowed the seeds in drills. This was done very expeditiously and exactly, with one of Ruggles, Nourse, and Mason's seed sowers.

In the latter part of the month of July the Lucerne had reached the height of 18 inches on an average, and had considerably blossomed. We cut it and fed it green, partly to hogs and partly to milch cows—both ate it voraciously. In just four weeks from the time it was cut, it had again grown to nearly the same height as before, and was cut a second time—and the first of November it was cut a third time the crop being heavier than either of the preceding. A piece of common red clover (very flourishing) immediately adjoining, the soil precisely similar, did not yield near half as much, in proportion, as the Lucerne.

We have no doubt it may be cut five times another year, and will yield at the rate of a ton and a half of hay to the acre, at each cutting.

Great National Work!

LADIES COMPANION, (established in 1834,) a popular and highly esteemed MAGAZINE OF GENERAL LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS: embellished with Gorgeous and Costly Engravings on Steel, Copper and Wood, the Quarterly Fashions, and also with Fashionable and Popular Music, arranged for the Piano-Forte, Harp and Guitar.

TERMS—$3 a year. Single copies 25 cents.—Office 109 Fulton street, New York.

Mrs. L. H. Sigourney: The editors are happy to communicate the information to their readers, that arrangements have been effected with this talented lady by which she will still continue to be a regular and constant contributor to the 'Ladies Companion.' Her engagements in other quarters will not interfere with that connection with the 'Companion,' which secures to its readers the enjoyment of her beautiful productions.

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes of Boston; Professor Longfellow of Cambridge College, and Mrs. Anna Maria Wells of Boston, will hereafter contribute to the 'Ladies Companion.'

SPLENDID NEW STEEL ENGRAVINGS by our best artists, accompany each number; illustrated by tales and spirited sketches, which will as heretofore, continue to be magnificent and far superior to those published in any cotemporary work in America.

QUARTERLY FASHIONS.

Plates of the prevailing Fashions appear once every three months, viz: December, March, June and September.

The Ladies Companion contains a larger quantity of reading than any other magazine issued in this country, and its subscription price is only three dollars a year. The great combination of talent secured for the coming year will render it unequalled by any other periodical.

THE MUSICAL DEPARTMENT.

This department of the Ladies Companion has ever commanded a large share of attention, and has been looked upon with no little interest by its readers, and more especially the Ladies, whom the publisher is in the highest degree anxious to please.—It will continue to be a subject of more than usual care to him, and to the Professor under whose supervision it is placed, to make that portion of the magazine allotted to Music, more than ever deserving of the countenance of every lover of music.—It has ever been and will continue to be the desire to have all pieces of Music printed correctly and free from errors.

Over every department an equally careful supervision will be strictly exercised by the Editors, and all appropriate expenditures will be liberally bestowed, as it is the design of the publisher, with the aid of his contributors and the advice of his friends to make the Ladies Companion distinguished for beauty and accuracy of its typography—the variety and high tone of its literary articles—and the unequalled splendor of its pictoral Embellishments, which are entirely new and engraved by A. Dick, expressly for the work.

It is the determination of the publisher to use every means to maintain the superiority which the Ladies Companion has obtained. For four years he has steadily pursued a course of improvement, and he flatters himself that his present facilities are such as to give the Ladies Companion eminent advantages over all other publications of its character.

From the foregoing it will be perceived that the Ladies Companion embraces every department within the range of Belles Letters and the Fine Arts: and no exertion or expense will be deemed too great to render the work equal to any other extant. The flattering and general testimonials of nearly every contemporary journal in the United States, and in fact many on the other side of the Atlantic, have strongly asserted the undeniable claims of the Ladies Companion to the support of the public generally. There is no work that gives its readers such a great return for their subscriptions.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST REGISTER.

EDITED BY AN ASSOCIATION OF MINISTERS. DEVOTED TO RELIGION, LITERATURE, AND GENERAL INTELLIGENCE. PUBLISHED BY GREENE, CAMPBELL, AND BURDICK.

VOLUME I. DE RUYTER, MADISON COUNTY, N. Y., THIRD-DAY, JUNE 23, 1840. NUMBER 16.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Register.

The following extracts from a letter from an esteemed minister in London, (Eng.) to Br. E. S. Bailey, Cor. Sec. of the S. D. B. General Conference, will be perused with interest by a great portion of our readers.—EDS. REG.

244 SHOREDITCH, (London,)
April 3, 1840.

MY DEAR BROTHER—I greatly lament that our correspondence should have been so undesignedly broken off. I cannot recollect, but think I did not write you the last year. The one now before me from you is dated April 25, 1838, in which you mention preaching with (the lost Sabbatarian,) Mr. Miller. I fear he is a poor sorry Sabbatarian, or he would not have been so long without finding them out.

I hope your Literary Institution is succeeding, which you informed me had just been opened.

On the 23d of March, last year, I lost Mrs. Shenstone, to whom I had been united 42 years. Having had much fatigue in nursing her for some months, and being from home frequently during the week days in the course of the last summer, and not hearing from you, was the cause of my not writing. I dare say you have transmitted your Minutes to New York, as requested, and as you say you would, but I have never received them; although I have often enquired of my Brother Belcher. The last Minutes I have received is the imperfect copy, wanting the first two pages and the last two, of 1835. Our postage is now reduced to 1*d*. a letter however near or far distant—but I believe it has no relation to ship letters from abroad. Nevertheless, I should like to have your Minutes complete, and do hope to hear from you by letter soon. If the Minutes were newspapers they would not be charged much; but on pamphlets the charge is high.

We have at length, after seven years' contention with the Bible Society for refusing to aid our translation in India, formed a New Society. A Mr. Archibald Maclay, A. M., from the American Bible Society, is over here. He breakfasted with me a week or two back. I have an address of his delivered at the Saratoga Baptist Association, at Middletown, Saratoga Co., N. Y. June 28, 1838. I think I informed you that our church had lost three male members, one of them received since Mr. Burnside's death; and that we had a person from a General Baptist church in town, now a member with us. I became acquainted with him (W. H. Black, Esq.) some time since, in consequence of filling up a Trust Deed—and on conversing with him about the Sabbath, he was determined to examine the subject. He is, I really believe, a thorough, zealous Sabbatarian. He is an Antiquarian—a man of great ability—a good Greek and Latin scholar. He is employed by the Government on Ancient Records, and has just been through the whole of Wales examining the Records of all the Courts of Law. He has written several excellent Tracts, called Sabbatic Tracts. No. 1, Doubts on the Authority of what is commonly called the Christian Sabbath. No. 2, Reasons for keeping holy the Seventh-Day of the Week as the true and only Christian Sabbath.—No. 3, What say the Scriptures? No. 4, What saith Tradition? No. 7, Objections against the Sabbath of the Seventh-Day stated and Answered. He proposes to publish about 16 Tracts in all; these are circulated gratis, and when completed will probably be printed together, and advertized.

Old Mrs. Slater, of Mill-Yard, is dead. We have called out Mr. Black to the Ministry. I have paid one visit, and was well received by the Miss Slaters. Mr. Black is invited by them for 6 months, and has preached since his return from Wales 3 Sabbaths, and he is pleased with the reception they gave him, and I do hope that some good will be effected there. I tell him "he must increase, but I must decrease."

We have at length brought up to London a member of our church, who has been coming these twenty years. And a good man, living at Ely, Cambridge-shire, has within these few years embraced the Sabbath. He is a preacher in the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion. He is very zealous, and as he has left business as a broker, if he could be brought to London, he might be very useful to our cause. I hope to effect this soon. He has written much, and is still writing.

There is certainly an increasing measure of light on the Seventh-day being kept as the Sabbath-day, and our Br. Black, when established at ———, will probably deliver a course of Lectures on the Sabbath, and another course on the subject of Baptism, on Sunday evenings, should the Lord spare him life and health. He is competent to argue the point with any man in the land, and would not fear to enter into public disputation with any one.

May the Lord now send prosperity.—My dear Brother, do request our American Brethren to pray for us.

Mr. Black has been employed for some years in doing for the Oxonians what they have not a man among them, I apprehend, capable of doing. He has been much at the University in the Bodleyan Library—and some of his Tracts are dated Oxford, which is a curious circumstance, as the Oxford Tracts are now making such a stir.—Some of them are Roman Catholics, or nearly so, but say their doctrines are taken from the Church of England.

Yours truly,
J. B. SHENSTON.

CIRCULAR LETTER OF THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

DEAR BRETHREN—Agreeably to custom, we address you from the place of our convocation, and it will probably be expected that some subject shall be presented that shall interest your minds, and convey important suggestions, for mutual improvement in the work of extending the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. With this view we shall address you. There is nothing, perhaps, that will more sensibly interest and profit you than an inquiry on practical subjects which affect us in our individual capacity.

A few years since the propriety of devoting a stated season to prayer, as a holy concert of the denomination, was proposed; and the object was, that God would give success to the cause of Missions, and especially to those enterprizes in which we are engaged—the Domestic Mission in the outposts of our own denomination, and the downtrodden, and long-neglected children of Abraham; which proposition was adopted, and we trust that your prayers and alms went up together to the Lord of Sabaoth. We now inquire of you as churches, and as individuals, how are you interested in this institution? Does the subject of a perishing world, and particularly the salvation of those whose cause we have espoused, interest you? Have you evidence that your prayers reach the holy presence of the Lord of the harvest? And is that corresponding effort put forth by you that proves sincerity and interest in the subject of your prayer?—that pecuniary aid which will enable those laboring in the field to pursue their work? For what will it profit if we say we have faith? or say to the destitute be ye instructed and comforted? Will faith in us send the gospel to the Israelites and sustain laborers in that arduous work? or aid the messenger of grace in traversing the desert in his labors of love? Surely not; for by our works is our faith made manifest. You may ask, why these interrogatories? We reply: The Domestic Mission is but faintly sustained, the Hebrew Mission is suspended, and the issue of the question,—what part have we in the work of evangelizing the Israelites?—is undecided. Our Missionary inquires with intense solicitude, why the work should be suspended with us while so much is doing by others for the Israelites with so much success, and while cheering prospects of usefulness in that work seemed just opening upon us, and the fulfillment of the prophetic promises are casting over the horizon of the East the evidence of approaching day? It is to be feared that something is wanting in us; and the drying up of the resources for the support of the mission, tell the causes too plain to be misunderstood. Is then the sun of our mission to set at the opening of the day? and our work to end at the commencement? and we retire with shame from a work for which we acknowledge ourselves responsible? Forbid, Dear Brethren, that this shall be the case; and to prevent it, let consistent exertions be made to send forth the healing streams of life from this portion of the Zion of God, which possess, in our opinion, facilities for the work which make us more eligible than most other denominations. But we are well aware that no great object can be attained without a corresponding effort, devotion and self-denial. Our liberality must be corresponding with our hopes. Let us, therefore, be consistent, pray unitedly and in sincerity, give liberally and without grudging, pursue the course perseveringly, and without misgivings hope confidently in the divine promises, and success will crown our efforts, God will be glorified, the cause of Missions sustained, the spread of the gospel insured, and we be made to rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of our salvation.

CORRESPONDING LETTER.

The Central Seventh Day Baptist Association, convened at Scott, June 10th, 1840: To their sister associations send Christian salutations.

DEAR BRETHREN—We have been permitted by the forbearing goodness of our Heavenly Father, to assemble in another annual session. Most of the churches have been represented, and we have enjoyed the pleasure of a representation from the Western and South Western Associations. Our deliberations, though marked with animation in discussion, have been characterized with great unanimity in their final decisions. We have received the pleasing intelligence, that several of our churches have been favored with precious revivals, and large additions have been made to some of them; while from others we learn that they are wading through sore trials and discouraging circumstances. As a body, we trust we are determined to fight the good fight of faith, and press through all opposition to the kingdom of Glory. We regret that circumstances will probably prevent our sending Messengers to your Associations, yet we are deeply solicitous to maintain a mutual and friendly intercourse with you, and assure you, that Messengers from your bodies will be hailed with joy in our future Anniversaries.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION IN THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

Man is a thinking being; and from his earliest existence commences forming new ideas; and as he advances in life, new opinions which will greatly influence his future thoughts, happiness, respectability and usefulness in the world. If the ideas or opinions which he forms on the various subjects presented to his consideration, are in whole or in part incorrect, his happiness and usefulness will in the same ratio be lessened; for erroneous opinions on any subject (excepting some extraordinary occurrences) always tend to augment the misery and not to increase the happiness of man, as by some supposed. Ignorance is the source of all erroneous opinions; for men form their opinions of subjects according to the light or information they possess in reference to them. Men do, and will, form some kind of opinion of every thing that comes within the scope of their natural or moral senses. The object of an enlightened christian education is not solely to extend our knowledge to subjects with which we have no acquaintance, but to form correct views on the various subjects already before the mind. If the above hypothesis be correct, the better a man is educated, the more correct will be his opinions, and, consequently, the more happy and useful will he be in the world. A right or proper education teaches us the nature and right use of things, by which we are enabled to shun what is hurtful and wrong, and to use to advantage that which is useful and right. Knowledge is therefore said to be power, which, when rightly applied, will prove a powerful auxiliary to the spread of truth throughout the world. It is easily to be seen from the nature of the subject, as well as from what has fallen under our almost every day's observation, that, that individual, sect, community, or nation, blessed with an enlightened christian education, possess a decided advantage over those that are more ignorant. These considerations should, in our opinion, influence this Association and all Seventh Day Baptists as they regard their own happiness and prosperity, and the happiness of all that comes within the circle of their influence, to use all proper efforts to elevate the standard of education in our several churches and communities. This may be done, by encouraging through the pulpit, the press, and various other ways, the education of the youth among us.

The means of obtaining knowledge are various; but in our opinion the best facilities afforded to Seventh Day Baptists for obtaining a good education, is found in the De Ruyter Institute, and we do therefore hope that it may receive the liberal patronage and sustaining influence of this Association.

Another means of obtaining a christian education and which ought to receive encouragement from this Association, is the Sabbath School institution, as it affords an excellent opportunity for obtaining a knowledge of Bible truths, without which, all other knowledge will prove to be of but little use. There are other helps for obtaining an enlightened education, which time and circumstances will not now permit us to mention.

REPORT ON THE STATE OF RELIGION, IN THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

The Committee on the state of Religion, Report:—That the means and opportunity for making an ample report are too limited; we therefore can but little more than reiterate the account received. It is evident that in most of our Churches the cause of Christ has suffered much from apathy, and in some, unpleasant difficulties exist. Still there are a few happy exceptions. Precious revivals have been experienced, and numbers have been added to our churches. We look forward to the time when a better state of things will exist, general peace and harmony prevail, and revivals greet us as in former times.

In order to hope with confidence for such glorious and happy results, we must be vigilant, watchful, and self-denying; and exercise judiciously the grace of forbearance and long-suffering, realizing that absolute perfection is not the lot of man.—But still the exercise of these graces should never be so construed as to connive at sin, corrupt the church, or embarrass its discipline; for the purity of the churches, and the judicious and impartial exercise of discipline, is indispensable to permanent and lasting prosperity.

RELIGIOUS.

RE-UNION IN HEAVEN.—How short is the earthly history of a family! A few years and those who are now embraced in a family circle will be scattered. The children now the object of tender solicitude, will have grown up and gone forth to their respective stations in the world. A few years more, and children and parents will have passed from this earthly stage. Their name will be no longer heard in their present dwelling. Their domestic loves and anxieties, happiness and sorrows will be a lost and forgotten history. Every heart in which it was written will be mouldering in the dust. And is this all? Is this the whole satisfaction which is provided for some of the strongest feelings of our hearts? If it be, how shall we dare pour forth our affections on objects so fleeting? How can such transitory beings, with whom our connection is so brief, engage all the love we are capable of feeling?—Why should not our feelings toward them be as feeble and unsatisfying as they?—But blessed be God, this is not all. Of this he has given us perfect assurance in the Gospel of his Son. Though to the eye of unenlightened nature the ties of domestic love seem scattered into dust, the spiritual eye of faith perceives that they have been loosened on earth, only to be resumed, under far happier circumstances in the regions of everlasting love and bliss. Though the history of a family may seem to be forgotten when the last member of it is laid in the grave, the memory of it still lives in immortal souls, and when the circle is wholly dissolved on earth, it is again completed in heaven.

ENJOYMENT IN RELIGION.—"A young lady was invited to attend a district prayer-meeting, by a visitor of the New York Tract Society. She went, and her mind received divine impressions. The visitor adds, "On the next Sabbath morning she attended a Bible class. After church I spoke to her. 'O!' said she, bursting into tears, 'I feel that I am a very great sinner: I never had such a realizing sense of my wickedness before!' I told her she must go to the cross of Calvary; there renounce all her sins, and trust in the merits of a bleeding Savior alone for pardon and acceptance with God. She thinks that she then made a full surrender of her heart to him. The next evening a young man in the same house, knowing something of her state of mind, invited her to attend the theater with him. 'But I told him no,' said she; 'I am going to a prayer meeting. How different are my feelings upon the subject of religion! I used to think it must be a very gloomy life to a young person; but I find more real enjoyment now in one hour than I have experienced from worldly pleasures all my life."

FOR PARENTS.

FAMILY GOVERNMENT.

Columns of newspapers and volumes of books have been written on this subject, and to very good purpose in many cases. But after all, the secret is more in a nutshell than is commonly supposed. The greatest secret in the whole matter consists in being a truly good parent. Your children see you in domestic carelessness. They know the real character of their parents better than persons who live in other houses, and who only see you when you are on your guard. If they find their parents unkind to each other, or failing in any way to maintain in private the characters which they assume in public, their respect is gone,—their confidence broken down. If your children have ever known you to be guilty of telling a lie, how can you govern them. If he sees you in public putting on the air and claiming to be a Christian, while in his close watchings he sees that you are full of pride and vanity and bitter feelings, and ambition and covetousness; that all your religion goes off at the corners of the streets, and none of it in your bed chamber; how can you govern your children? First then, be a good man, and a good father.

Secondly, govern yourself, always, and without the least degree of unfair charity towards yourself. The laws you enact for your children, never break yourself. If you break out with bad passion and excuse yourself, you must certainly be as generous to your children, and excuse them for the same fault in the same way. How can you govern your children if you cannot govern yourself?

Thirdly, let all your requirements be just and generous; never given for your own good, but always for the good of your children.

Fourthly, spare no pains—give yourself no rest in body and mind, while any thing remains to be done which can enlighten the understandings or sweeten the affections of your children.

Fifthly, let your orders be wisely given, and then maintained at all hazards and at all times. Never in one instance allow your word to fail. Trust chiefly to kindness and persuasion and reasoning, and use punishment of any sort as little as possible. But let it be always understood, that obedience full and entire, must be yielded to your directions, and that you will, though with great considerateness and affection, never slacken your hand nor relax your demands until such obedience is rendered.

Mind these rules, and with very little severity in any way, you will seldom fail of securing all the benefits of a reciprocal affectionate and well ordered family.—N. Y. Jour. of Commerce.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

"Is it well with the child?" And she answered, "It is well."—2 Kings, iv. 29.

"Is it well with the child!" And she answer'd,
"'T is well;"
But I gaz'd on the mother who spake,
For the tremulous tear, as it sprang from its cell,
Bade a doubt in my bosom awake;
And I mark'd that the bloom in her features had fled,
So late in their lovelinss rare,
And the hue of the watcher that bends o'er the dead,
Was gathering in pensiveness there.

"Is it well with the child!" And she answer'd,
"'T is well."
I remembered its beauty and grace,
When the tones of its laughter did tunefully swell
In affection's delighted embrace:
And thro' their long fringe, as it rose from its sleep,
Its eyes beam'd a rapturous ray,
And I wondered that silence should settle so deep
O'er the home of a being so gay.

"Is it well with the child!" And she said, "It is well."
It hath tasted of sickness and pain,
Of the pang, and the groan, and the gasp it might tell,—
It never will suffer again.
In my dreams, as an angel; it stands by my side,
In the garments of glory and love;
And I hear its glad lays to the Saviour who died,
'Mid the choir of the blessed above.

AN EXAMPLE.

Whilst a teacher connected with a Sabbath school in the city of New York, was on a visit to the house of a friend, the conversation turned upon the collection and disposition of money in the school. A little boy, not more than five years of age, standing by, was much interested in the conversation, and inquired if the heathen children had any Bibles to read. The teacher told him that they had but a very few. "Then," said he, "I will save my money for them." Some months afterwards, the teacher, who had forgoten the conversation, called again upon the family, and judge of her surprise, when the little boy went up stairs, and brought down the amount of his savings, two hundred and two cents!! which had been given him by his father to spend. This little child, upon hearing the teacher advert to the poor heathen children, was willing to go without his toys and confectionary that he had been in the habit of buying, in order to give his money to obtain Bibles for the heathen.—A little girl, also who was living at service, when the children met in the school-room to receive their New-Year's presents, gave to her teacher ten cents, which had been given her to spend on that day. Another little girl gave her teacher a shilling, which had been given her for a like purpose.—Sabbath school scholars, will you read the above accounts, which are strictly true, and think of the destitute heathen boys and girls? Compare their situation with yours. The sun rises and sets for them, the earth yields her fruits for their support—but they thank not the "Giver of all good" for his kindness to them; the Sabbath morning comes, but with it no "sound of the church going bell,"—for all days are alike to them; and when the sun goes down, and they retire to repose, no voice ascends to the Father of all, to thank him for his kindness and mercy to them through the day; but they live as it were but to die. I might tell you of many little heathen children, who have learned in the sabbath school to read and spell, and have been made quite happy, by means of the money that has been sent from Christian countries; but you have probably read them. Then I hope you will be encouraged, and give your mite for so good a cause as this, and if you have not a missionary society in your school, form one, and by means of the cent a week, which any boy or girl may save, you can gather money enough to buy Bibles and other books for the children of ignorance.

"SHE PLAYS LIKE A CHRISTIAN."—A boy of nine, in Connecticut, recently became pious. Among the children, in a family with whom he used to play, was W., a young girl who had also become pious.—Some time after he became interested in religion, he visited this family again to engage in some of the innocent amusements of childhood. As he returned home, he said to his mother:

"Mother, I know W. is a Christian."

"What makes you think so, my son?"
inquired his mother.

"Because," said he, with great simplicity, "she plays like a Christian."

"What! plays like a Christian?"

"Yes, mother, she is always good natured and affectionate. She never gets angry,—if you get away all her things, she doesn't get angry."

It is very important that all pious children should show that they are christians in all their conduct, even by the manner and spirit in which they engage in their amusements. In this way, others will see their good works,—their mild, affectionate conduct,—and will be led to glorify their Father who is in heaven.—S. S. Visiter.

SABBATH MEDITATIONS.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

COME to thy secret chamber, oh, my soul!—
Deep, deep within.—The thrilling harp of love,
That cheers thee daily with its symphonies,
Bid it keep silence, and the hand of Hope
Rest 'mid the rosebuds it would weave for thee.
Repel intrusive care, and bid pale Grief,
With locks dishevell'd o'er her temples thrown,
Pause at the gate,—for these are of earth.
The pilgrim's foot that nears the Holy Land
Turns from the caravan with which he made
His journey through the sands, and loathes the noise
Of all its tinkling bells.

Bow down, my soul!
And enter in alone, to meet thy God
And crave a Sabbath blessing. Thou, perchance,
By the strong urgency of prayer, shalt gain
That gift of faith, which, like the wondrous light
Of the descending Prophet's brow, reveal'd,
Even to the thoughtless crowd, with what dread guest,
On Sinai's shrouded top, his trembling lip
Had dared to talk.

FOR THE SINNER.

A WORD TO YOU.

Stupid sinner! a word to you! Is it possible for you to remain stupid, amid the awakening interests that now encircle you? A stupid sinner! How incongruous the phrase sounds! Rebellion against Jehovah's government is proved against thee; and yet thou art stupid. Jesus poured out his blood for thee, and yet thou art stupid. Thou art one, over whose conversion the angels of heaven would rejoice; and yet, concerning this momentous subject, thou art stupid. Hell yawns to engulf thee; heaven invites thee; in a short time the grave will enclose thy body, and if thou diest as thou now art, the world of despair will be the abode of thy soul. Every moment thou art exposed to such a dread exchange of worlds. And canst thou be stupid? Awake, stupid sinner! or thou wilt soon lift up thine eyes, "being in torment."

A young lady who was resident in a minister's family, remained at home on Sabbath, and going to the library, she took from the shelf a volume of sermons. She glanced at this sentiment—viz: that sometimes, when God is about to give a sinner up to hardness of heart he leaves him to unusual stupidity. This truth awakened her soul. Reader! may it awaken yours, ere it be too late!

Opposing sinner! a word to you! Why do you oppose religion? What can you gain by such a course? Your neighbor, that stupid sinner, also opposes the truth of the gospel; but he does not so boldly unfurl the flag of hostility as you do. You boisterously proclaim war against God.—You glory in your shame. Do not oppose the only system that can save you from utter ruin. Do not beat away the life-boat that floats along side your tossed and sinking bark. "Stop! poor sinner! stop and think!"

Awakened sinner! a word to you!—The mercy of God is indeed great to you, if he has begun to show you something of your condition. Had it not been for the Spirit's awakening influences, you would have slumbered on undisturbed. But remember, you are none the better merely because you are awakened. If you are a not a Christian, you are at this moment an opposing sinner at heart, however much you may be awakened to a sense of your guilt and danger. Do you feel yourself then flee to Jesus without delay. Think not that because you are awakened, you are safe. Hell is peopled with those who on earth were awakened sinners.

"Awak'd by Sinai's awful sound?"

Distressed sinner! a word to you! Do not suppose that your distress merits any favor for you at the hand of God. If sinners suppose that because they are so much distressed God will have mercy on them, they contemn those agonies which were endured on Calvary. Your increased distress is the fruit of your protracted rebellion. Do not, then, imagine for a moment, that your tears, and anguish, and cries, shall be reckoned to make up any part, no, not the smallest fraction of the ground of your acceptance with God. Your only source of hope can be expressed in three short words—faith in Christ. The language of your heart must be;

"Simply to thy cross I cling;"

then all shall be peace between your troubled soul and your offended God.

Hoping sinner! a word to you! Is your only hope in the atoning blood of the Lamb of God? If so, I rejoice. You will be kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation. But examine well.—You may have deceived yourself. Read the parable of the ten virgins, and contemplate its leading sentiment, which is this.—Make thorough preparation for the hour of trial. Take oil in your vessels with your lamps. Do you indeed hope that your feet are taken from the miry clay, and are placed upon the rock!—Then will you sing, "Oh, to grace how great a debtor!" Do you begin to taste the gospel feast? Then will you be constrained to say—

"Why was I made to hear thy voice,
And enter while there's room,
While thousands make a wretched choice,
And rather starve than come?"

Do you hope that you now inquire the way to Zion, with your face thitherward?—Then cast your eye upon those multitudes in that broad road that leads to death. Go, young convert. Warn that stupid sinner.—Expostulate with that opposing sinner.—Exort that awakened sinner. Plead in melting terms with that distressed sinner. In the deep fervor of your soul, tell them all what a Saviour you have found!

FOR THE MINISTER.

CAUSES OF RUIN.

ADDRESSED TO A CLERGYMAN.

Men are ruined in their internal interest by failing to look within, by being so absorbed in the pursuit of earthly good as to neglect the state of their hearts. But can this be supposed to be the case with us, who must never hope to discharge our office with effect without an intimate acquaintance with the inward man—without tracing the secret operations of nature and of grace—without closely inspecting the causes of revival, and of decay, in the spiritual life, and detecting the most secret springs and plausible artifices of temptation, in all which we shall be successful just in proportion to the degree of devout attention we bestow on the movements of our own minds.

Men are ruined in their eternal interest by living as though they were their own, and neglecting to realize the certainty of a future account. But it must surely require no small effort to divert our attention from this truth, who have not only the same interest in it with others, but, in consequence of the care of souls, possess a responsibility of a distinct and awful character, since not one of those to whom that care extends can fall short of salvation through our neglect or default, but his blood will be required at our hands. Where, in short, can we turn our eyes without meeting with incentives to piety? What part of the sacred function can we touch which will not remind us of the beauty of holiness, the evil of sin, and the emptiness of all sublunary good; or, where shall we not find ourselves in a temple resounding with awful voices, and filled with holy inspirations?

From the New York Evangelist.

VULGARITY IN PREACHING.

Some men, professing to avoid language hard to be understood, and to speak with great plainness, adopt expressions into their most solemn sermons, which are only fit for the intercourse of "rowdies," and the colloquial slang of the bar-room—that is, for occasions which should have no existence. The vulgar minded may be pleased at this, because the very incongruity of these with religion may seem to them like wit. The more intelligent and devout may sometimes endeavor to endure them, lest their remonstrance might be construed into opposition to the work of salvation. The result is bad—religion is calculated to elevate and refine even the lowest propensities of human nature; how is it then abused when its ministry do violence to those which are most gentle, noble, and attractive. Profane men make comparisons advantageous to themselves. Devout men feel their sublimest aspirations of spiritual affection, clouded by vexatious and unworthy associations. Men of cultivated taste, who are irreligious, have their prejudices confirmed. The public taste is injured, piety is corrupted, its standard depressed, and its influence contracted.

For all this, what apology can we find? Is it ignorance? Can any man, who is too ignorant to read the Scriptures, be admitted to the pulpit? Is it a design to be understood? Can any man expect to use language better fitted to be understood than that of the prophets, apostles, and most of all, of the Lord Jesus Christ?—Yet will any advocate of vulgarisms and flash phrases, in the pulpit, pretend that they are sanctioned in that book in which a fool need not err. Will a man who makes the style of Moses or Job, of David or Isaiah, of Paul or John, his study and his model, fall into a dialect, both irreverent and vulgar; which, like the unjust judge, knows not God, neither regards man? Was there ever a preacher more replete with simplicity, more awfully earnest, more pungently impressive, than Him who spake as never man spake? Yet, where, in all his recorded words, can you find one which will justify irreverence in our addresses to God, or vulgarity in our discourses to men. Men of solid education are not often led into this error. Ignorant men are liable to this, and to the opposite also. Orators who have ingorance, but have a notion to appear learned, often become bombastic, collect pompous words, for the sake of seeming sublime, and make themselves ridiculous to the intelligent, for the sake of seeming to be prodigies to the vulgar.

GLORIOUS MISSIONARY RESULTS!

O, there is a day—call it the millennium, or by any other name—there is a period yet destined to bless the earth, when it shall no more be necessary to witness for God, for all shall know him; the knowledge of his glory shall fill the earth as the waters cover the sea. Happy state of Christian triumph!—a day without a cloud—the reproach of indolence wiped away from the Church, and ignorance from the world.—Truth shall have completed the conquest of error—Christ shall have given law to the world—and, impressing his image on every heart, shall receive the homage of a renovated race. Brethren, these are visions of God—and let nothing rob us of the inspiration to be derived from gazing at them. They are visions—but visions painted by the hand of God—dear in every age to the Church of God—gazed on in death by the Son of God. Yes, then they were brought and set before him, and such was the joy with which they filled him, that he endured the cross, despising the shame. Then, on the lofty and moral elevation of the cross, all the ages of time, and all the triumphs of his Church, passed in review before him. He saw our missionaries go forth in his name to distant climes—again he looked, and saw them surrounded by ten thousand converts to his grace. He saw the vail fall from the heart of the Jew; and heard their bitter mourning as they stood looking at him whom they had pierced. He saw Ethiopia stretching out her hands unto God. He heard his name shouted from land to land, as the watchword of salvation, and marked how its every echo shook and brought down the pillars of the empire of sin. He saw the race of Ishmael, that now traverses the desert tracts of Arabia— the castes of India, with their numbers infinite—the national Chinese—the Tartar hordes—the unknown and snow-conceald inhabitants of the north—the tribes of Europe—and all the islands of the sea; he saw them flocking into his kingdom—his grace the theme of every tongue—his glory the object of every eye He saw the travail of his soul, and was satisfied; his soul was satisfied! Glorious intimation! Even in the hour of its travail it was satisfied! What an unlimited vision of human happiness must it have been! Happiness not bounded by time, but filling the expanse of eternity! His prophetic eye caught, even then, a view of the infinite result in heaven! His ear caught, the far, far-distant shout of his redeemed and glorified Church, singing—"Worthy is the Lamb that was slain!" Brethren, if we would do justice to our office as witnesses for God—if we would catch the true inspiration of our work—we, too, must often cross, as he did, the thresh hold of eternity—transport ourselves ten thousand ages hence, into the blessedness of heaven, and behold the fruits of our instrumentality there, still adding new joy to angels, new crowns to Jesus, new tides of glory around the throne of God. Realizing that scene, we should gird up our loins afresh, as if a new command had come down from heaven, calling us by name to be witnesses for God.—Rev. John Harris.

Pleasures of virtuous affections.—If it be a proof of benevolence in God, that our external organs of taste should have been so framed as to have a liking for wholesome food—it is no less the proof both of a benevolent and righteous God, so to have framed our mental economy as that right and wholesome morality should be palatable to the taste of the inner man. Virtue is not only seen to be right—it is felt to be delicious. There is a heart's ease, or a hearts enjoyment, even in the first purposes of kindness, as well as in its subsequent performances. There is a certain rejoicing sense of clearness in the consistency, the exactitude of justice and truth. There is a triumphant elevation of spirit in magnanimity and honor. In perfect harmony with this, there is a placid feeling of serenity and humility. There is a noble satisfaction in those virtues, which, at the bidding of discipline, or by the power of self-command, may have been achieved over the propensities of animal nature. There is an elate independence of soul, in the consciousness of having nothing to hide, and nothing to be ashamed of. In a word, by the constitution of our nature, each virtue has its appropriate charm; and virtue, on the whole, has a fund of varied, as well as of perpetual enjoyment, to him who hath imbibed its spirit, and is under the guidance of its principles. He feels all to be health and harmony within; and without, he seems as if to breathe in an atmosphere of beauteous transparency—proving how much the nature of man and the nature of virtue are in unison with each other.—Dr. Chalmers.

Religion in the World.—I have often seen a little child following his parent in the field, and stooping down, now and then, to gather a few flowers. He looks up and sees him at a distance, and the child runs and gets up to him again, afraid he should go too far away. So the Christian will gather a few flowers from the world, and suffer his God to be often at a distance from him; but the instant he perceives that he is alone, he runs to reach again his Father, Protector and Friend.—Rowland Hill.

Entertain the highest regard for the word of God, and disperse religious books, if your circumstances will permit.

THE LAW OF KINDNESS.

The spirit of the Bible, the genius of the religion it reveals and inculcates, and the new nature of every true child of God, are in direct contrast with the selfish, bitter, and contentous disposition which characterizes those who live after the rudiments of this world, and are alienated from the life of God. The Christian is beloved of God, and possessed of such graces as to render him lovely. Of all the virtues that adorn his character, none are more conspicuous than that of kindness. This is a legitimate effect of his union with Christ. It is the developement of his character as a "partaker of the divine nature." Through his whole life, previous to conversion, a recipient of his Maker's kindness, (though insensible of his obligation, and a stranger to his lost condition, and the exercise of true gratitude,) in the beneficent process by which he was brought to God and made acceptable in the Beloved, he beholds and admires infinite goodness and love, and to reciprocate these hallowed principles and feelings is no less necessary, as evidential of his adoption, or essential to his happiness, than imperative as a duty. As God's long suffering kindness is so apparent in all that concerns him—so inseparably connected with his whole history, and so identified with his best hopes—he finds in this subject the most ample scope for his meditations, and is led to practice those admirable virtues and examples spread out before him. The religion of the Bible having exerted a transforming influence on the inward man, from the abundance of a heart sanctified by grace, and the seat of holy passions, his lips breathe the "law of kindness." To the children of the kingdom he is "kindly affectioned," and when commending this blessed religion to the men of this world, he relies upon the truth kindly expressed, to accomplish that which the most subtle arguments, and the loftiest talents accompanied by a wrong overbearing spirit could never achieve. Being defamed, he entreats! Being persecuted, he blesses, and curses not!

How happy must christian society be, when in the mouth of every professor of godliness shall be found the "law of kindness." When the word of God dispensed by His ministers shall melt and move men's hearts, and incline them to his statutes, bind them in affection's bonds one to another, and exert a constraining influence upon the unconverted to attract them to the cross of Christ. 'Then God shall cause the light of the church to rise in obscurity, and her darkness shall be as the noon day.'

TEMPERANCE.

It must be truly gratifying to every lover of religion and virtue, to witness the advancement and triumph of the cause of Temperance. Its achievements in connection with those of religion, are already the wonder of earth, and the joy of Heaven. It has dried the tears of many of the children of misfortune, cheered many disconsolate hearts, shed the rays of hope on the despairing mind; and, as an angel of mercy brought deliverance to many who were going down to the pit. Amidst the bitterness of its opponents, and the apathy of its professed friends, it has unobtrusively though firmly pursued the "even tenor of its way," with "healing in its wings" for the blessing of the nations, till it has acquired too much strength, and addressed itself with too much force to the good sense of the community to be ever obliterated, or its onward march essentially impeded.

Among the noblest of its accomplishments is its recent triumph among the Irish Catholics, who, until a very late period have been proof against its reasons, and spurned its proffered benefits. The priesthood of that church, who, but a few years since denounced the propagation of temperance sentiments as a "mortal sin," have (some of them at least,) taken hold of that subject with a most praise-worthy zeal, and a success hitherto unparalleled in the annals of Temperance has rewarded their toils.

It is stated that 1,500,000 persons are acting on the total abstinence principle in Ireland, a great part of whom have embraced those sentiments within a few months past. The work is also extending through the Canadas with astonishing rapidity.—The same success attends the dissemination of Temperance principles in the United States. In Albany, a society has lately been formed on the principles of total abstinence, which already numbers 500, and the work still extending.

Regarding what we have already witnessed on this subject as a kind of "first fruits," what immense benefits may be expected to result from the more general diffusion of these redeeming principles among that numerous people. The tremendous tide of emigration flowing in among us from the old world, chastened and purified by temperance and morality, would, instead of being contemplated with horror, as formerly, be met with a cordial welcome, and instead of filling our cities and large towns with profanity, riot, and blood-shed, would be instrumental in turning our forests into fruitful fields—would minister to the permanency of our free institutions, and elevate instead of depressing our national character. We cannot but hope that the introduction of Temperance principles and habits among the adherents of the Romish Communion, may be the precursor of the diffusion of evangelical religion among them, and that a people hitherto unapproachable by Protestants, may receive the scriptures, renounce their spurious faith, be blessed in Christ, and be a blessing to the world. We are happy to be able to say, that so far as our information extends, the advancement of Temperance principles has recently been commensurate with the triumph of Gospel Truth. We belive that in most instances of conversion among those who were addicted to "strong drink," (and many of the most dissolute are said to have been hopefully converted during the late extensive revivals of religion,) in embracing Christ, they have renounced the bottle.

In the same ratio that Temperance has gained ground during the last ten years, it may be confidently expected that at no distant day, drinking whatever can intoxicate, will have as few apologists as any other vice has at the present time—that the visible church will be made up of Nazarites who drink no wine nor strong drink from infancy to manhood. Let the friends of the good cause thank God and take courage.

DEDICATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Meeting-House in Scott, having recently been enlarged and otherwise thoroughly repaired, was re-opened on the 9th instant and dedicated to the worship of Almighty God. Rev. Eli S. Bailey preached on the occasion from Ps. xxvii. 4: "One thing have I desired of the Lord," &c. He dwelt, 1, On the desirableness of gospel privileges. 2, On the pleasures and benefits of social worship. 3, The necessity and utility of deep piety. 4, On the glorious prospects before true Christians.

He was followed by J. Greene from Haggai, ii. 9: "The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former house, saith the Lord of hosts: and in this place will I give peace," &c. The speaker briefly noticed the circumstances which rendered the former house interesting and glorious. These were the numerous and extensive revivals enjoyed in the vicinity, since the erection of the house, most of which had commenced among the people worshiping there. He stated that truth had truimphed there through its own power notwithstanding the weakness of its advocates. That the merits of the various benevolent institutions had been canvassed there, and had been triumphantly sustained, though violently opposed for a time by much of the talent and influence of the community. In addition to this, the union which had prevailed among the different denominations of christians, and the presence of God enjoyed by those who had worshiped there, had rendered the place like the "gate of Heaven."

He observed, in the second place, as a reason why the latter house should be more glorious,

1. That the friends of the various benevolent institutions, instead of engaging in sharp contests for their establishment, might direct all their efforts to their advancement without annoyance.

2. That the church would bring more experience to aid them in carrying forward the work of salvation as instruments.

3. That a much greater amount of intelligence, and especially in reference to the manner of conducting revivals, was possessed by the church now than formerly.

4. That the religious education of children being so much superior at the present, to that in former times, had removed many formidable impediments out of the way of the successful preaching of the gospel.

Finally, old christians saw heaven nearer—younger ones were more firmly established—and many facilities were enjoyed hitherto unknown. "In a word, in whatever light we look on the surrounding circumstances, all is full of promise that the glory of this latter house shall be greater than that of the former house, and in that place the presence of God shall be enjoyed as in a living temple; peace shall abound, and the number of souls saved by the instrumentality of the church shall be greatly multiplied."

In a business letter from Brother N. V. Hull we are pleased to learn that the church of which he is Pastor is steadily, though not rapidly, increasing in numbers, and, as it is hoped, is growing in grace. The peculiar sentiments of our denomination are commending themselves to the attention of the people in that vicinity.

Brother Hull mentions some peculiar trials which christians in his society, and in a church further west, are called to pass through on account of their undeviating attachment to the cause and truth of God.—These brethren have our tenderest sympathies; and we would caution them against despondency. They should meet their trials with firmness, and "glorify God in the fires," knowing that the trial of their "faith is precious," and if their affections are set on Christ, he will cause all things to work together for their good. Every true child of God must from his heart pity persecutors.

Preaching appointments.—Rev. Eli S. Bailey (by Divine permission) will preach at the Seventh-day Baptist Meeting-House in Adams on the second Sabbath in July, at their usual time of assembling. Br. B. will remain a number of Sabbaths in that vicinity, and labor among the people as circumstances may require.

Rev. William Green will preach (Providence permitting) in the second church in Verona on the first Sabbath in July; in second Brookfield on the second and third Sabbaths; in De Ruyter on the fourth Sabbath, and in Scott on the first Sabbath in August. There will also be preaching as above in the second Brookfield church on the fourth Sabbath in July by one of the Editors of this paper.

We sent out the Minutes of the Central Association last week to such as wished them sent by mail. Those who receive them by private conveyance are notified that they are ready, and will be forwarded the first opportunity.

Correction.—The article in our last headed 'Auburn and Rochester Rail Road,' should have been credited to the New-York Baptist Register, but was unintentionally omitted. Brother Beebe has our thanks for reminding us of our neglect.

The Ladies' Companion for June is received. The present number contains, as usual, many rich and valuable articles, together with several splendid engravings on Steel.

We publish the circular and corresponding letters of the Seventh-day Baptist Central Association, with the reports of the Committees on the state of religion, &c., believing they will be interesting to our readers generally. We hope to have room for the Missionary Minutes in our next.

According to a resolution of the Evangelical Society, their Constitution was to have been published in connection with their minutes. But as it was not in our possession, it was not inserted. We will publish it, however, in an extra sheet as soon as some friend will forward it to us, which we trust will be equally acceptable.

Brother James Bailey has returned from his tour to the South and West, where he has spent the past year. During a short interview we enjoyed with Br. B. we received some refreshing intelligence of the work of the Lord in several places where he labored. In due time we may have the privilege of publishing his Journal, or such parts of it as may be of general interest.

☞ Dr. GEORGE TOMLINSON is respectfully requested to act as agent for the Register.

For the Register.

To R. D.

With regard to the verification of the hypothesis presented by me, that appeared in the 15th No. of the Register, I should have said nothing had the gentleman's expression for finding the diameter of the cavity been correct; for in that case, although the phraseology of the hypothesis might be considered exceptionable, the result would be correct, or at least, would vary only by a certain fraction as will appear in the sequel, and I must do myself the justice to remark, that I was perfectly aware what the mathematical verification would be, and intended the explanation as purely mechanical though sufficiently correct for all practical purposes.

The expression to which I referred is as follows: pD square plus p divided by 3=p8000 cube, which I think cannot be true, for if D plus 1 and D—1=the diameter of the two globes, as they may, then (D plus 1) cube X p divided by 6—(D—1) cube X p divided by 6=p X D square plus 1-3p=solidity of the shell which must be = to the solidity of the Earth independent of the hypothesis, but solidity of the Earth = 8000 cube X p divided by 6 and not 8000 cube X p, now p X D square plus 1-3 p=8000 cube X p divided by 6 and D square plus 1 divided by 3=8000 cube divided by 6. Therefore D = 282,118 and D—1=292,117 the same as by hypothesis. With respect,

THE DYING HUSBAND.

BY ANN S. STEPHENS.

Dearest, I'm dying: bend thee down
One little moment by my bed,
And let the shadows of thy hair
Fall gently o'er my aching head.

Oh, raise me up, and let me feel
Once more the beatings of thy heart,
And press thy lips again to mine,
Before in midnight death we part.

Nay, tremble not, but fold me close,
Pillowed upon thy own dear breast,
I fain would let my struggling soul
Pass forth to its eternal rest.

She stoops, and on her bursting heart
His drooping head is resting now,
While white and trembling fingers part
The damp hair from his pallid brow.

And there upon his cold white form,
With quiv'ring lip the kiss was given;
And pressed as if 'twould draw him back,
Back from the very gates of Heaven.

There, like a dying bird, his soul
Lay panting on its quivering life;
And still his almost lifeless arms
Clung fondly to his pale young wife.

One look he gave her, and it seemed
An angel had from Heaven above
Shaded with wings of tenderness
The troubled fountain of his love.

A holy smile came o'er his face,
As moonlight gleaming over snow;
One struggling breath—one faint embrace,
And lifeless he is lying low.

The setting sun with golden light
Was flooding all the room and bed,
Enfolding with his pinions bright,
The fainting wife, the marble dead.

REVIVAL RECORD.

The church in Scott, enjoys at present a comfortable state of religious feeling.—Eleven persons have lately been received into its fellowship by one of the Editors of this paper.

Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio.—In this place there has recently been a revival of great solemnity. The pastor of one of the churches concludes an account of it with the following remarks:

Special Answers to Prayer.—At the beginning of the revival, there were in our church twelve sisters with unconverted husbands. These husbands were repeatedly made the special subjects of prayer; and now eight of them are hoping in God, and have erected the family altar; and six of them have united with the church, and come around the table of their common Lord, to celebrate his dying love.

Another class of persons for whom special prayer was repeatedly offered, were our young men. Of those who have made a profession, eight are from this class, and others are hopefully converted; so that a large number of the converts are of those for whom Christians were the most importunate at the throne of grace.

Detroit, Mich.—This place has been favored with an extensive revival the past winter and spring. Large accessions were made to the Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist churches. Means, fasting and continuous evening prayer meetings, with preaching three or four times a week.

Cleaveland, Ohio.—Six hundred have joined the different churches, the fruits of the late revival.

Wisconsin.—A gentleman in Wisconsin writes to his brother in New Haven, that revivals are prevailing extensively there, exceeding in power and interest any thing he ever saw in New England. In a neighborhood not far from Southport, about a dozen infidels banded together in a club, to oppose the work, but in a short time, every one of them was converted. Surely the Lord has designs of mercy for this guilty land.

Revival in Scotland.—A gentleman in Scotland writing to his friend in Boston, closes his letter with the following pleasing intelligence:—An immense, and most delightful change seems to be taking place among all the Scottish churches. The spirit of revival is abroad, earnest prayer is ascending to God. Christians are awakening to a new life, and we doubt not, hundreds and thousands will still be brought out of darkness into marvelous light. May the good work proceed with augmented power in that and this land, and throughout the world, till

"O'er our ransomed nature,
The Lamb for sinners slain,
Redeemer, King, Creator,
In bliss returns to reign!"

Mr. Lord, the Seaman's preacher in Boston, recently stated that within a few days, he had heard of several very interesting conversions at sea, without any other means than the reading of the Bible, thus showing that the mighty energy of the Holy Spirit is at work at sea as well as by land.

It is stated, that there are indications of good among the prisoners of Charlestown State prison, and the house of correction at South Boston.

Freeport.—The following is a postscript of a letter from the pastor of the Baptist church in Freeport. A glorious work of revival is going on in Freeport. It is already in every part of the town. It is progressing in the Baptist, Congregationalists, and Methodist societies. Number of conversions estimated in all at about sixty.—Zions Adv.

INTELLIGENCE.

Texas.—The New Orleans papers of the 8th inst. contain Galveston dates to the 3d.

The Civilian says, business of every kind is completely at a stand, and our wharves, which during the winter, wore such business like appearance, are nearly deserted; every thing is dull; the markets being confined to small sales of articles for immediate consumption. We shall discontinue our prices current until the fall business commences.

The steamboat Constitution collapsed one of her boilers, and a Mr. Rice was so scalded that he died in consequence.

President Lamar was in Galveston, and we see a notice that he was to hold his levee at the Tremont House, at 11 o'clock of the 2d of June.

The Trinity river was very high, the water flowing beyond its natural bounds nearly the whole length of the stream.

It is understood says the Galveston Courier of the 1st, that arrangements are making, or already made, to have an agent of our government at New Orleans, who will have the power and authority to fund in that place the promissory notes of Texas, in conformity with the act of the last session of Congress, the same as if those notes were presented at the treasury department in this country.

The Traveller's Friend.—In Madagascar, grows a singular tree (Urania) which, from its property of yielding water, is called the Traveller's friend. It differs from most other trees, in having all its branches in one place, like the sticks of a fan, or the feathers of a peacock's tail. At the extremity of each branch, grows a broad double leaf, several feet in length, which spreads itself out very gracefully. These leaves radiate heat so rapidly after sunset, that a copious deposition of dew takes place upon them; soon collecting into drops, forms little streams which go down the branches to the trunk. Here it is received into hollow spaces of considerable magnitude, one of which is found at the root of every branch. Those branches lie one over the other alternately, and when a knife, or what is better, a flat piece of stick, (for it is not necessary to cut the tree,) is inserted between the parts which overlay, and slightly drawn to one side so as to cause an opening, a stream of water gushes out, as if from a fountain. Hence the appropriate name of "Traveller's Friend."

Twenty-Seventh Congress.—The election of 3 Representatives to the next Congress takes place in Louisiana on the 6th of July, ensuing. Illinois elects 3 members on the 3d of August. Vermont 5 members on the 1st of September. Maine 8 members September 14th. Georgia 9 members Oct. 5th. Pennsylvania 28 members, and Ohio 19 members on the 13th of Oct. New York and New Jersey elect in November, and in the course of the same month the choice of Presidential electors is to be effected throughout the United States

Outrage at Oswego.—A nefarious attempt was made to destroy the Steamboat Great Britain, whilst lying at the wharf, at Oswego, on Saturday afternoon last. A trunk containing combustibles was placed on board which exploding, set the boat on fire. It is supposed that the explosion took place prematurely, and that had it occurred half an hour later, after the boat had put out on her way to Niagara, more serious danger would have been incurred. A refugee by the name of Lett, is in custody charged with the act. Lett is a desperado, and boasts of having killed Capt. Usher, and blown up Brock's monument.—Western State Journal.

Newly Discovered Island.—The Evening Signal contains the following letter from an American naval officer, dated

U. S. Schr. Enterprize,
Pernambuco, May 6, 1840.

My Dear Sir.—I have the pleasure to communicate to you the intelligence of the discovery of a new Island or Continent, as it is called, in the Southern Ocean, by the French Exploring ships Astrolabe and Zelic. This information was brought here by the English barque Calcutta, from Van Dieman's land; on board of which were some specimens of granite rock, and also a chart of the coast. The land has been called Adilie, and is laid down from the long. 139 deg. 30 m. east of Paris to 188 deg. 30 m.; and latitude from 65 deg. to 67 deg. south. It is reported that the land is completely protected by an icy barrier extending many miles into the sea. As this will no doubt be the first information received in the United States, I take much pleasure in conveying it to you.

Your friend and humble servant,
J. A. Winslow.

It is said that this island has long been known to American whalers, and is mentioned in Fanning's voyages, page 447.

De Witt Clinton and Napoleon.—Much excitement has prevailed for several days on the collission of these steamboats. The Napoleon having started out from the wharf as she was proceeding up the river, was run upon by the De Witt Clinton, to the imminent danger of several hundred lives on board of the Napoleon. By some it was considered an act of design on the part of the captain of the De Witt Clinton. The captain himself declares that it was unavoidable, and in no degree the result of design. He had waited twelve minutes beyond his time, at the ardent entreaties of a gentleman whose baggage had not arrived; and he stopped the boat as soon as it was cleared from the piers, so that it could be done with safety. There was evidently great carelessness. The passengers were all struck with alarm. A pistol was fired from the Napoleon at the pilot of the De Witt Clinton—many lives were awfully exposed, and the public are still endeavoring to understand the nature of the affair.—N. Y. Evangelist.

London A. Slavery Convention.—The following is as complete a list of the delegates from this country as we can make from personal information:

Isaac Winslow and George Bradburn, Esqrs., represent, we believe, the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society.

Hon. Seth Sprague, Jr., represents the Massachusetts Abolition Society.

Prof. James Dean and Col. J. P. Miller, represent the Vermont Anti-Slavery Society.

Rev. G. C. Shephard and John T. Norton, Esq., the Connecticut Anti-Slavery Society.

James Mott and Henry Grew, the Eastern Pennsylvanian Society.

James C. Fuller, the New York State Society.

Dr. N. S. Townsend, Rev. John Keep, Col. Dawes, and F. Donaldson, the Ohio A. S. Society.

Rev. N. Colver, Elon Galusha and C. P. Grovesnor, the American Baptist A. S. Convention.

W. L. Garrison, N. P. Rogers, Esq., and C. L. Raymond, (and perhaps Mrs. Mott,) represent the late meeting of the American A. S. Society.

James G. Birney and H. B. Stanton represent the same Society, under its former organization, and also the American Foreign A. S. Society.—Emancipator.

From Yucatan.—By the latest advices from Yucatan, received at New Orleans, it appears that the state is in the power of the Federalists, who have revived a provisional government on the plan of the constitution of 1824. The officers of that period have been reinstated, and the first acts of the new power are said to have been received with enthusiasm by the people. The city of Campeachy was closely besieged by land, and strictly blockaded by sea; and the several forts in the immediate vicinity of the city were in the possession of the Federalists, who had given notice by proclamation, that they would open their batteries upon the city on the 24th of May, if Campeachy was not surrendered to them previous to that day. All the citizens of Campeachy, with their families were moving out; and the Federalists were determined to carry the place by storm if it held out. The United States Consul, Mr. McGregor, was prepared to take his family on board the Levant, which was lying in front of Campeachy to receive him.—Eve. Post.

Gerrit Smith.—In the last number of the Liberator is a long letter from Gerrit Smith, Esq., of Peterboro', containing a statement of his views, which if we understand him correctly are now adverse to any general organization for anti-slavery action. He says:

"Since hearing how contentious, boisterous and disgraceful was the late anniversary meeting of the American Anti-Slavery Society, I have come to the conclusion, that the benefits our anti-slavery organization yields, are not an adequate recompense for the danger it does our cause, in perpetuating our mutual quarrels; and that it is therefore better that it be abandoned."

Death of a Member of Congress.—We are pained to learn that the Hon. Anson Brown, a Representative in Congress from the District composed of the counties of Saratoga and Schenectada, died last evening at his residence at Ballston Spa. Mr. Brown returned from Washington about a week ago, quite ill and much enfeebled, but it was hoped that a change of air would restore him. But he has fallen in mid-career of a life of honor and usefulness. He had lived without reproach and died to be universally lamented.—Eve. Jour.

Piracy.—Capt. Trueman, of the brig Pedraza, at New York from Mayaguez, reports that while at Mayaguez, the schooner Caledonia of Jersey City, arrived there, forty five days from Cuba and short of provisions, having on board several French passengers and a quantity of specie belonging to the latter. After remaining at Mayaguez two or three days, the C. departed from St. Thomas; the night after, the captain and crew seized the passengers, tied them, and put them ashore, after which they continued their voyage. As soon as this intelligence reached Mayaguez a Spanish war schooner was sent in pursuit of the Caledonia.

The Grain Crops.—The grass, fruit and garden vegetables, about this neighborhood, never promised a fairer reward to their owners, when the day arrives for their harvesting, than they do at present.—Harrisburg (Pa.) Reporter.

There will be plenty of mouths to eat it, among the operatives of Great Britain and France, but our provident rulers are so intent on procuring a market for tobacco that they will do nothing to remove the tyranny that keeps the bread stuffs rotten in our granaries, and the poor of Europe starving for the want of it.

Albany Ale.—Some three or four years ago, Edward C. Delevan, Esq., of Albany, who has for years been a devoted and persevering advocate of the cause of Temperance, published the ingredients of which ale was composed, and the process of the operation, if we rightly remember. He stated particularly in reference to the Albany brewers, that they used impure water, &c., though this was no more than was used elsewhere, when good water could not be obtained. The brewers resented this charge, and prosecuted Mr. Delevan for uttering it. The case has just been finally decided by the court, and Mr. Delevan got his case with costs! Thus has he proved to a jury, the fact which many doubted before, that ale is made of some of the most deleterious substances that can be introduced into the human system. Will the brewers be quiet after this? Will men drink their beer?

The Mayor of Boston in his toast at the entertainment given in honor of the Unicorn, called Boston the half-way house between England and the Rocky Mountains. The expression was a happy one, and no one can doubt that the intercourse thus established will conduce to the prosperity as well as to the union and harmony of the two countries and the colonies. Boston, with her Western rail-road and her mail steam-ships to Liverpool, will gain upon New-York. For five months in the year, when New-York is shut out from the West, the rich productions of that section will pour into Boston and be thence distributed to the Atlantic States and to Europe.—Providence Journal.

A Captive Released.—The following is an extract of a letter just receied from Gerrit Smith.

"I am happy to be able to inform you that James Watkins Seward, who was imprisoned at New Orleans, and who was formerly a member of my colored school, is liberated. Money, however, had to be paid to effect his liberation.—Friend of Man.

JEWISH MARRIAGE AT WHITE-CHURCH.

On Sunday last, a circumstance, as novel as pleasing, took place at White-church. For the second time, the interesting ceremony of an Israelitish wedding was there performed. The marriage of the Jews in itself has so much scriptural interest, from the circumstance of its being performed precisely as it was some 3000 or more years since, that a correspondent who was an eye witness on Sunday has favored us with the account of it.

On entering the room was seen Rabbi L. Chapman, priest of the Jews, from Birmingham, occupied in writing the marriage contract upon a parchment. The rabbi having concluded the contract, handed it to others present to read, and then to the bridegroom, who, after apparently well considering the contents, which were written in the Hebrew language, signed the same, as also did two witnesses. This being duly executed, the bridegroom was conducted from the room again, the bride being all the time invisible. A canopy was then erected, being supported by four persons of the Jewish faith, and solemn strains of music announced the approach of the bridegroom. The reverend officiate having placed himself beneath the canopy, the bridegroom was introduced, supported on both sides by male friends.

Again the sound of music proclaimed the approach of the bride, who was similarly supported, but by two ladies. The bridal dress was strictly scriptural; the maiden was attired in pure white, covered with a veil, as in Genesis 24, 65. The music having ceased, the bride, still supported as before, was thrice led round her future husband. We believe that this emanates from the marriage of Jacob and Leah—Jacob having his bride vailed, married Leah instead of Rachael, Genesis 29, 26. For this reason the bridegroom has an opportunity of ascertaining from the gait or figure of his intended wife, as he has no opportunity of reading her countenance through the folds of her veil. Having thus circled round him, she was placed on the right side of her future lord.

The priest proceeded then to pronounce a blessing upon all present, holding at the time a glass of wine in his hand, which, after the conclusion of a prayer, was handed by a friend to the happy couple, in token of peace with all the world; they, having sipped the same, modestly returned it. The reverend and venerable rabbi then proceeded to read aloud the document before described, and then a second glass was filled, and a prayer offered up for the future grace of the new couple, and the second glass was tasted by both of the young people in token of consent to each other. Then followed a solemn silence—a moment of suspense—the ring was to be placed on the bride's finger. The fair hand was extended (as we thought) rather willingly, and the ring being handed to the rabbi, he first exhibited to others, and then examined it himself. He then gave it to the bridegroom, who placed it upon the fore finger of the right hand of his bride, pronouncing the talismanic words, "Hahab Makadasith Leh, Bethubath Zu Kadth Mosha Veh, Yesrael" (Anglice—'Thus I wed thee according to the laws of Israel as by Moses commanded,') left the ring on the hand of the bride. A glass was placed upon the ground, and in a moment—crash—the brittle vessel was shattered in a thousand pieces by the right foot of the bridegroom, as a token of the uncertainty of life, and that all our joys may be shattered in a moment.

The sudden change of this solemnity to joy was electric; no sooner was the glass in the dust than the music struck up in lively note, the place sounded with the words "Mezel Tous"—(joy, joy!) echo upon echo seemed to sound in our ears, congratulations were heartfelt; truly exhilarating was the scene. The veil of the bride was in a moment respectfully removed, and she stood before us with eyes streaming, thankful and happy yet fearful, and smiling on the happy husband,—A look—a prayer—they were married—all the ceremony was over.

The lady is Miss Priscilla Lazarus, of White-church, the gentleman, Mr. Audolph Cohen, of Birmingham. The reverend rabbi was express from Birmingham for the occasion.—Salopian Journal.

The Bankrupt Law.—We believe the voice of the people calls for the passage of this law. We see not why it is not well founded. With wise and well matured limitations and conditions, we think the measure right, expedient, and necessary to the good of community. The following memorial, from this city, was read in Senate on Saturday.—N. Y. Evan.

"Whereas a misapprehension appears to have existed on the part of several members present at a meeting of the Board on the 22d ult., as to the tenor of some portions of a memorial to Congress, at said meeting, particularly as to the application of the restrictions, therein suggested, as to the cases of liabilities heretofore suggested.

And whereas it is the desire of the Board that its opinions as to the general provisions of a Bankrupt Law would be correctly understood.

Resolved, That the Board of Trade is fully impressed with the importance and necessity of a Bankrupt Law which shall relieve the debtor from his liabilities upon the faithful and honest surrender of all his effects.

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Board, a discharge under such a law should not be withheld from those who, previous to its passage, may, in accordance with the usages of trade, and the custom of merchants, have given preferences to particular debts as confidential and to be first paid.

Resolved, That no such discrimination shall be allowed in regard to future transactions, subsequent to the passage of the law, but that all debts shall be considered of the same character and entitled to an equal "pro rata" division of the bankrupt effects.

Resolved, That in relation to liabilities contracted previous to the passage of the law, the assent of one half or any other number of the creditors of a bankrupt shall not be necessary to secure his discharge. The honest surrender of his entire effects alone constituting the grounds of his release.

Resolved, That such other provisions shall be incorporated into the law, as shall in the wisdom of Congress be deemed expedient, to protect the just rights of creditors, prevent fraud or collusion of any kind, guard against abuses of credit, and give increased security and stability to the future business of the country."

SUMMARY.

A valuable lead mine has been discovered near Sunbury, Pa.

It is estimated that there are 135 miles of paved street, and 25,000 houses in New York city.

It is is stated in the Greensburg (Pa.) Sentinel, that some persons, being engaged in boring the earth, near that town, for salt water, and when at the depth of 712 feet, they struck a vein of bituminous coal, which was found to be upwards of five feet in depth.

Rev. John W. Nevin, D. D. has been appointed professor of Theology, in the German Reformed Seminary at Mercersburg, Pa.

The pirates who lately captured the English brig Vernon, off Cape Antonio, Cuba, murdering the Captain, Cunningham, and two men, are in prison at Havanna. At their preliminary examination, a spectator says, the cold-blooded recitals of these demons, made his heart shrink within him.—They resided at Regla, and were well known at Havanna.

Mr. Charles Scott, of Barry, Illinois, was waylaid and robbed on the 16th ult., by two scoundrels in disguise, who threatened to blow out his brains if he made any resistance. The act was prepetrated near Scott's residence, and they took from him about $4000 in Illinois Bills.

Hon. Daniel Webster has accepted an invitation to address the people of Barre, Mass., on the approaching fourth of July.

The Mediterranean Squadron.—It is stated in the Philadelphia North American, that five or six Lieutenants and the Surgeon of the Squadron, have been sent home by Com. Hull. The cause of the difficulty is said to have originated from having the ladies of the Commodore family on board the ship.—Eve. Jour.

Gen. Atkinson has amicably arranged for the peaceable removal of the Winnebagoes, and is at Fort Winnebago with 500 regulars, to be joined by Col. Worth with his regiment (600) on the 20th. The General has had no difficulty since arresting the two great agitators of the tribe Yellow Thunder and Little Thunder.

The Steam-Packet Neptune.—The Steam Packet Neptune, Capt. Penover, with 170 passengers, arrived at New York yesterday in eight days from New Orleans.—Eve. Jour.

Ginger Beer made Quickly.—A gallon of boiling water is poured over three quarters of a pound of loaf sugar, one ounce and a quarter of ginger, and the peel of one lemon; when milk-warm, the juice of the lemon and a spoonful of yeast are added. It should be made in the evening and bottled next morning, in half pint stone bottles, and the cork tied down with twine.

Whale Fishery.—The Nantucket Inquirer has just published a table, from which it appears that upward of five hundred American vessels are engaged in the whale fishery, of which 364 belong to ports in Massachusetts, with an invested capital of $9,800,900.

POETRY.

From the New York American.

LINES BY MISS LUCY HOOPER.

Lines written after seeing among a collection of beautiful paintings—copies from the old masters recently sent to New York from Italy—one representing the daughter of Herod as bearing the head of John the Baptist on a charger, and wearing upon her countenance an expression, not of triumph, as one might suppose, but rather of soft and sorrowful remorse, as she looks upon the calm and beautiful features of her victim.

Mother! I bring thy gift;
Take from my hand the dreaded boon—I pray
Take it, the still pale sorrow of the face
Hath left upon my soul its living trace,
Never to pass away—
Since from these lips one word of idle breath
Blanched that calm face—oh! mother, this is death!

What is it that I see
From all the pure and settled features gleaming?
Reproach! Reproach! My dreams are strange and wild;
Mother! hadst thou no pity on thy child?
Lo! a celestial smile seems softly beaming
On the hushed lips; my mother, canst thou brook
Longer upon thy victim's face to look?

Alas! at yester morn
My heart was light, and to the viol's sound
I gaily danced, while crowned with summer flowers,
And swiftly by me sped the flying hours;
And all was joy around—
Not DEATH. Oh, mother! could I say thee nay?
Take from thy daughter's hand thy boon away.

Take it! my heart is sad;
And the pure forehead hath an icy chill—
I dare not touch it, for avenging heaven
Hath shuddering visions to my fancy given,
And the pale face appals me, and cold still
With the closed lips. Oh tell me, could I know
That the pale features of the dead were so?

I may not turn away
From the charmed brow; and I have heard his name
Even as a prophet by his people spoken,
And that high brow in death bears seal and token
Of one whose words were flame—
Oh! Holy Teacher! couldst thou rise and live,
Would not these hushed lips whisper, "I forgive!"

Away with flute and harp,
With the glad heart forever, and dance;
Never again shall tabret sound for me!
Oh! fearful Mother! I have brought to thee
The silent dead with his rebuking glance,
And the crushed heart of one to whom is given,
Wild dreams of judgment, and offended Heaven.

MISCELLANEOUS.

"FIFTEEN MINUTES BEFORE THE TIME."

If there is any one principle to which the formation of my character has been chiefly indebted, it is to this motto of a distinguished naval commander. Nobody ever waited for Lord Nelson. He made it an invariable rule to be present at every appointment, and to be ready for every enterprise at least fifteen minutes before the time, and to wait rather impatiently the arrival of the moment for action. When the hour had come, and the delay of others rendered it inexpedient to proceed, he looked upon his own obligation as cancelled, withdrew immediately from the place of rendezvous, and no inducement could ever prevail upon him to return.

The lesson inculcated by this motto, is to be in time for every duty. It should be the standard principle to every man who has any regard to those with whom he acts, to be truly punctual to all his engagements. To himself it is a rule of incalculable importance, and applies to every occupation and every pursuit. The ancients represented him under the similitude of an old man, with a single lock on his forehead, gravely but steadily approaching an assembled multitude—and whoever seized this lock, and held him by it, was borne onward with the most assured pledge that could be given, of future success. But if suffered to pass them, he spread the wings that till then were concealed behind him, and flew away with a rapidity which rendered pursuit utterly vain. Hence the homely adage. "Take time by the forelock." Better be fifteen minutes too early than one too late. Too late! alas, what a crowd of sensations cluster around that ill-omened phrase!—The disappointments how numerous! The disasters how sad! The consequences, O who can trace them, as they reach thro' all future time, and embosom themselves in the abyss of eternity!

The importance to one's self of being before the time, may, perhaps be more clearly illustrated by an example. I have in my eye, a young man who was my classmate in college. There was nothing in the structure of his mind or in its developement peculiarly striking. It seemed to me a mind cast in the ordinary mould, with no stamp upon it of either genius or brilliancy. But I remarked the regularity with which he attended upon all the duties of the institution. He was ever before the time in the chapel, the recitation room, the society's hall, or wherever else there was a just claim upon his presence and attention. Nor did he ever offer as an excuse that he was unprepared for any exercise to which he was properly called. He took time by the forelock, and had his lessons all thoroughly digested long before the hour of recitation arrived. His essays were all written a week in advance of the time when he was expected to read them, and as leisure offered, he would frequently remodel and rewrite them. He left nothing to be done at the eleventh hour; but carried out the principle of punctuality into every thing that concerned him. The result was, he left many of his class lagging behind, while he pressed onward with increasing energy, and making every day a sensible increase to his stock of knowledge. He was at last graduated with a distinction which he had not hoped to attain; and, without entering into the minute particulars of his after life, suffice it to say he became a minister of the everlasting Gospel, where he carried out this same principal in his family, in his parochial visitations, and in the meetings of ecclesiastical councils. Whoever else was behind the time, with him there was but one undeviating rule. He was never tardy—never unprepared: and by this means he acquired that vigor of thought that energy of style, that pathos of utterence essentially requisite to distinguished usefulness as a herald of the cross. There was nothing tame or imbecile, or common place in any of his efforts. To himself, then, his habit of punctuality was amazingly useful. And not less so to others than to himself. This example has had a powerful influence in procuring a similar habit among all those who were within its range. Nor has he failed to impress the duty by those arguments which every ingenious mind will admit to be unanswerable. What right have I to cause a number of men whom I have engaged to meet at a particular hour, not only to waste their time, but to become impatient and fretful by my delay? I rob them of that which I can never restore—the precious hours thus worse than wasted—I set a pernicious example: I betray an important trust—I tantalize with the sensibility of those whom I am bound to respect, and cut off a portion of their usefulness. In an individual case, the loss which I have occasioned may be small, but in the aggregate, the amount exceeds belief.—Christian Observer.

DESCRIPTION OF PATMOS.

THE PLACE OF JOHN'S BANISHMENT.

Patmos now named Palmosa, is one of those small islands in the Archipelago, or Ægean sea, which went under the general name of Cycledes, and is supposed to have been one of the most rocky, barren and unproductive among them. Its whole circumference does not exceed eighteen miles; and though it is placed at the distance of forty miles from the Asiatic continent, yet owing to its mountainous surface it can be easily seen from the city of Ephesus. It was long used as a state prison by the Romans. It was indeed their principal depot in the Mediteranean for those prisoners who were put for any length of time under severe restraint. In most places the shores are inaccessable, rendering it difficulty of access—and equally difficult to escape from. There is not a spot in the Archipelago which has more the appearance of a volcanic origin than Patmos. Different parts have the resemblance of craters, and substances resembling lava are common among the fragments of the rocks. La Seala, the only town in the island, appears to be built on the edge of one of the ancient craters, sloping off on either side like the roof of a house. As the valleys are generally left without culture, few places can present a more gloomy and desolate appearance to the traveler.—Culbertson.

NO TIME TO READ PAPERS.—All men find time for every thing that is really a gratification to them; and hence the complaint of no time is, in fact, no taste for newspapers. Every man has time to read a paper during a rainy day, or a long evening, or sometimes when waiting for his meals. If he is not a slave, he cretainly can find time to improve his mind. The most industrious people always find time to read, and it is the idle and lazy only who have no time.

FOR THE FARMER.

From the Christian Advocate and Journal.

EDUCATION OF FARMERS FOR LEGISLATORS.

BY JOSIAH HOLBROOK.

Messrs. Editors,—The dictates of experience and of common sense must convince any candid mind that nine-tenths of the members of legislatures ought to be practical farmers and mechanics. For this opinion, two reasons are sufficient, if no others could be adduced. First, the principal object of laws is to promote the interest and protect the rights of these two classes of citizens, as they constitute seven-eights, and ought to constitute nine-tenths, of the community. Second, they are educated in schools fitted to make sounder and more enlightened statesmen than ever are or can be produced in any other schools but those of experience.

The soundness of the first reason, will probably not be questioned; that of the second, I am aware, may be, even by some farmers and mechanics themselves. But I have for many years been convinced that farmers and mechanics were better qualified for composing our legislatures than any theoretical statesman, from the fact that they have greater influence, and advocate sounder and more republican doctrines in all legislatures of which they are members. The only misfortune is, that they are not elected to fill our legislatures, or to constitute a majority of them.

If I am not greatly mistaken, one of the principal sources of the civil and political evils we suffer is, in making the profession of law so much the channel to offices of emolument and honor. The practice presents an inconsistency on the very face of it. It is evidently inconsistent, and highly improper, that one class of men should institute laws, expound laws, and execute laws, which it may be supposed they will do to promote their own interests, while that class constitutes a very small minority of the community, though their number is ten times, probably fifty times, as great as the most healthy state of the community requires.

It is for the interest of the community to have laws few, simple, plain, just, and free from technicalities; so that the plainest farmer or mechanic can read and understand them. It is for the interest of the legal profession to have laws numerous, complicated, ambiguous, and loaded down with technicalities. It is for the interests of farmers and mechanics, and for all other professions save one, to have the laws, whether few or many, simple or complicated, plain or ambiguous, in common or technical language, respected and strictly observed. It subserves the legal profession to have the laws violated, the peace of neighborhoods disturbed, farmers and mechanics interrupted in their business, to attend court for settling difficulties among themeslves, or act as witnesses or jurors to settle those of others.

If neighbors, or any members of the community, find it necessary to resort to law to secure rights or settle difficulties, it is for their interest to have them settled at once. It is for the interest of the legal profession to have them continued from court to court, and from year to year.

From these views it must be evident, that so far as personal interest is concerned, the farmer and mechanic have superior qualifications for legislation. In their facilities of knowing and judging of the necessity, fitness, and justness of laws to be enacted, and in the competency to draft them, they are not inferior. It is a notorious fact, in all our legislatures, that an intelligent farmer or mechanic will draft a bill much more to the points in the case, and far less exceptionable, than can be done by any other person, without his practical knowledge.

Without enlarging upon the views here presented, the case must be too evident to be denied, or doubted, that so far as the enactment of laws is concerned, the practice of selecting our legislators from any one profession is inconsistent, improper, impolitic and mischievous. But this is not the only, or, perhaps, the principal evil in the case Making a certain profession the regular road to office, to honor, to power, and to profit, tempts thousands to resort to it who would otherwise have continued to follow the plough, or to ply their strength and skill over the anvil or workbench, or to abandon a useful for a mischievious vocation.

To avoid such evils, and, as far as possible, to repair the injuries already done by the inconsistent and anti-republican practice refered to, constituting our legislatures, and filling our various offices, in a measure, with farmers and mechanics, appear to be the plain, simple, and rational measures, perhaps the only measures. adequate to the evils. It is also plain that the remedy for these evils, already frightful in their character and magnitude, and daily and rapidly increasing, is entirely in the hands of those who are groaning under them, and who need the remedy. I do not pretend that the interests of farmers, or mechanics, or of both, are the only interests to be protected or promoted; nor do I contend that our legislatures or other offices ought to be filled entirely from those classes. I only contend that they ought to be represented in proportion to their numbers, and represented by themselves. I hold to this doctrine, because they must be supposed to understand their own interests better than any others can for them; because, being educated in schools of experience; they may be supposed to be, as they are actually found to be, sounder and safer men to be relied upon; and because, by thus doing, litigation and its attendant evils will be diminished, and the wealth, the intelligence, and the virtue of our republic, greatly promoted.

Though entirely convinced that the education of farmers and of mechanics, in its present neglected state, is better fitted to make enlightened, sound, and safe legislators than are or can be produced by our colleges, or by a learned profession, it is still evident that it is very limited and imperfect, compared with what an enlightened system of education would make it, and that too without any additional expense of time or money, but with a saving of both; or with what they might make it by improving the facilities they enjoy for intellectual and moral improvement, in connection with their business pursuits, not only without injury, but greatly to their benefit as farmers and mechanics. If the education of farmers and mechanics were what a rational and practical system would make it, if they understood and appreciated the knowledge they already possess, and their facilities for greatly extending that knowledge, they could hardly fail of seeing the propriety, or of availing themselves of the privilege of appointing persons from their own professions to protect and promote their own rights and interests, to annul laws they do not need, to simplify those that are complicated, to render plain those that are ambiguous, and to put all in the English language, and in terms they themselves can understand, without supporting a distinct profession to translate or explain them.

If the education of farmers and mechanics were extensive and practical, as it evidently may be, they would be entirely qualified to peform many kinds of business for which they now resort to others; such as drawing contracts, giving power of attorney, making out bills of sale, drawing bonds, conveying property by lease, mortgage, deed or otherwise, drawing wills, legacies, or bequests, and for preparing and understanding almost any written instruments they might need in the transaction of business, which would save them great trouble and expense.

To avoid the evils and secure the benefits here refered to, no one need to act under the influence of prejudice, or a desire of proscription. Farmers and mechanics have simply to attend to their own education, and to select and appoint, from their own professions, individuals to promote their interests, and to secure and protect their rights, and they can hardly fail of accomplishing their object.

Great National Work!

LADIES COMPANION, (established in 1834,) a popular and highly esteemed MAGAZINE OF GENERAL LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS: embellished with Gorgeous and Costly Engravings on Steel, Copper and Wood, the Quarterly Fashions, and also with Fashionable and Popular Music, arranged for the Piano-Forte, Harp and Guitar.

TERMS—$3 a year. Single copies 25 cents.—Office 109 Fulton street, New York.

Mrs. L. H. Sigourney: The editors are happy to communicate the information to their readers, that arrangements have been effected with this talented lady by which she will still continue to be a regular and constant contributor to the 'Ladies Companion.' Her engagements in other quarters will not interfere with that connection with the 'Companion,' which secures to its readers the enjoyment of her beautiful productions.

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes of Boston; Professor Longfellow of Cambridge College, and Mrs. Anna Maria Wells of Boston, will hereafter contribute to the 'Ladies Companion.'

SPLENDID NEW STEEL ENGRAVINGS by our best artists, accompany each number; illustrated by tales and spirited sketches, which will as heretofore, continue to be magnificent and far superior to those published in any cotemporary work in America.

QUARTERLY FASHIONS.

Plates of the prevailing Fashions appear once every three months, viz: December, March, June and September.

The Ladies Companion contains a larger quantity of reading than any other magazine issued in this country, and its subscription price is only three dollars a year. The great combination of talent secured for the coming year will render it unequalled by any other periodical.

THE MUSICAL DEPARTMENT.

This department of the Ladies Companion has ever commanded a large share of attention, and has been looked upon with no little interest by its readers, and more especially the Ladies, whom the publisher is in the highest degree anxious to please.—It will continue to be a subject of more than usual care to him, and to the Professor under whose supervision it is placed, to make that portion of the magazine allotted to Music, more than ever deserving of the countenance of every lover of music.—It has ever been and will continue to be the desire to have all pieces of Music printed correctly and free from errors.

Over every department an equally careful supervision will be strictly exercised by the Editors, and all appropriate expenditures will be liberally bestowed, as it is the design of the publisher, with the aid of his contributors and the advice of his friends to make the Ladies Companion distinguished for beauty and accuracy of its typography—the variety and high tone of its literary articles—and the unequalled splendor of its pictoral Embellishments, which are entirely new and engraved by A. Dick, expressly for the work.

It is the determination of the publisher to use every means to maintain the superiority which the Ladies Companion has obtained. For four years he has steadily pursued a course of improvement, and he flatters himself that his present facilities are such as to give the Ladies Companion eminent advantages over all other publications of its character.

From the foregoing it will be perceived that the Ladies Companion embraces every department within the range of Belles Letters and the Fine Arts: and no exertion or expense will be deemed too great to render the work equal to any other extant. The flattering and general testimonials of nearly every contemporary journal in the United States, and in fact many on the other side of the Atlantic, have strongly asserted the undeniable claims of the Ladies Companion to the support of the public generally. There is no work that gives its readers such a great return for their subscriptions.

TERMS.—$3 a year in advance, or $4 during the year. No subscription received for less than one year.

Complete sets of the volume from May, 1839, can be furnished at the subscription price by applying at the office. All letters must be addressed, post paid, to WM. W. SNOWDEN, 109 Fulton street, N. Y.

Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? and who shall stand in his holy place? He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul to vanity, nor sworn deceitfully.—Ps. xxiv. 3—4.

1. To be pure in heart requires of a man that he be humble, meek, lowly in heart, self-abased in the sight of God; in opposition to that proud spirit so much the opposite of godliness and true holiness.—It does not require of him to bow in adoration to any one but God. Yet this should ever be remembered, that if the "heart is right in the sight of God;" we shall ever have right feelings for our fellow men.—Neither does it require of him to think more lowly of himself than what is proper; "but to think soberly;" to judge his actions and motives by the word of God.—As far as our heart is pure, conscience will applaud us. Therefore, a consciousness of right action is not inconsistent with the principles of the gospel; nor in its nature opposed to that of the purity of the heart. "Their thoughts in the meanwhile either accusing or else excusing one another."—Rom. ii. 14—15. God being one, so perfect in all his attributes, that when by his grace he gives repentance unto life, and makes an application of the blood of Christ to the cleansing of the heart; we are to conceive of the work as well done; and the heart thus sanctified, has such views of the purity and the excellence of God as renders it unable to bear any thing which is sinful. It is perfectly sensible of the purity of God's law, and loves God the more as it perceives more of his holiness. The Psalmist says, "O how love I thy law! it is my meditation all the day."

This purity of heart does not imply, that a man shall arrive to such a state as to live and not sin. "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves." 1 John, i. 10; but it certainly implies that he shall have a very lively sense of sin whenever he is overtaken in any fault. Here may be seen something of the difference between a pure and an impure heart. While the one possessing a pure heart, and being ensnared through the weakness of the flesh, feels it in his inmost soul; and loathes himself as one unholy and unfit to dwell in the presence of a God of purity, and cries out with Paul, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Rom. vii. 24. The one with an impure heart can roll sin as a sweet morsel under his tongue, and if he is assailed by conscience, that faithful monitor, he begins to treat it as the husbandman did the heir:—"Come, let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours;" or else, by continued rebellion, he grieves away the spirit, and thus by stealth takes a little repose.—O fatal repose! How many have laid themselves down for a short season, and finally have slept the sleep of death?

2. The pure in heart are ever ready to perform the duties incumbent upon them in the station in which they are placed.—Though from the weakness of the flesh they find they have a cross to bear, yet they "glory in the cross," and continually cry unto God to give them more strength; to cause the light of his glorious countenance to break through the clouds, which like the darkness of night may hang over them, to shine into their hearts with the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Or if they are permitted to behold a full blaze of light; though their hopes are strong, and their hearts beat high; yet they having compared themselves so often with the word of God, and the character and purity of the author of it, they find there is a great necessity of humility, lest they fall into the snare of the devil, be puffed up with spiritual pride, and be brought into condemnation. Their cry is, "Who can understand his errors! Cleanse thou me from secret faults." Ps. xix. 12. How often have we put up this or a like cry? Or have we gloried in ourselves, and prided ourselves in the works of our hands; shunned the cross of Christ and rejoiced in our own strength?

The man possessed of a pure heart will not smother convictions of duty, nor evade the performance of it. He will not, thro' the hurry of business, suffer the world to encroach upon him so as to lead to the forsaking of his closet, nor the duties which he owes to his family, and to God in his family. He will not begin to say to himself, "Now perhaps this going to God with such punctuality is useless, for God knows what I want, and it will do as well for me to raise my thoughts and my desires to heaven while about my business, as prayer is but the desire of the heart." Take care. In this way one can soon reason himself into an unbeliever. An unbeliever did I say? From what but unbelief can such arguments as these proceed? From what but a heart dead to spiritual enjoyments, and instead of being filled with the love of God, is filled up with the love of the world? When we chose God for our portion, we were completely sick of sin and the vanities of the world, and renounced them as inconsistent. Do we now love them?—"If any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him." Can the sin-sick soul delight itself in finery; in making a fine appearance? No! How despicable self looks then! Of how little worth a gaudy dress, when the terrors of God's holy law, broken ten thousand times, hangs with fearful weight over their heads! Of what importance would tinsel then be in our sight! Yea, or that men should think that we were weak? Who stands then to see whether he can make an elegant prayer? Who stays at home then because he fancies his neighbor has done wrong?—Then are they ready to go to the house of God. Then will they give a ready ear to conscience, and we can hear them cry with Job, "O that I knew where I might find him! that I might come even to his seat! I would order my cause before him and fill my mouth with arguments." And is the redeemed soul any less earnest than this? No, his heart being purified by faith, he sees clearly the great benefit conferred upon fallen man, inasmuch as a ransom has been provided, and life and immortality are brought to light in the gospel. "He hath taken my feet from the horrible pit and miry clay, &c. Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called the sons of God. O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men."

Have you grown remiss in duty? Are you cleaving to the world? Are you delighting yourself in dress—in trifling amusements—in evil surmisings—in unholy desires—in inordinate affections? Are you glorying in some performance or strength of your own, instead of the cross of Christ? Are you seeking for the phantoms and delusions of this life, instead of "the kingdom of God and his righteousness? If so, what reason have you to believe that you are possessed of a sanctified heart? Or that Christ or heaven are yours? O be entreated to examine yourselves in the light of truth, and so determine to whom you belong; meantime let your prayer be, "create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me."

COVENANT RELATIONS.

I entered into a Covenant with thee, and thou becamest mine.—Ezek. xvi. 8.

A most interesting relation of the creature to God is here recognized. It is not a relation common to every human being; but belongs only to those who are "taken within the bond of the covenant of grace, and have sincerely consented to the gracious terms of it." The covenant comes to man in terms propounded by his Maker.—One of the simplest forms in which it is proposed may be seen in the words, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." He who accepts the terms becomes a party to the covenant. He who believes, and exhibits the fruits of faith, in a pious temper and holy life, can plead the promise, thou shalt be saved. This is the stipulation on the part of God, which his own gracious promise binds him to fulfil.—To accept the terms is called "taking hold of the covenant." Is. lvi. 4.

The more common form in which the stipulation was expressed in the Old Testament is, "I will be their God." It involves the same pledge; it guarantees all that an intelligent being can desire. To have God for our God, is to have all his perfections engaged in our behalf; his mercy, to pardon our sins, and pity and comfort us in all our afflictions; his wisdom, to foresee and provide for all events, which will affect us, to counsel and guide us, and bring all things to a happy issue; his power to guard us, to protect us from evil, and to keep us from falling; his bounty and kindness, to enrich us with all needed good, to give grace here, and glory hereafter; his omniscience, to watch over us, and prepare us for all dangers; his holiness, to be the pattern and pledge of our own; his omnipotence, to attend and solace us in all places and conditions; his truth and faithfulness, to make us assured of finally reaching the heaven, and obtaining the salvation which he has promised to believers; his all sufficiency, to be our daily and perpetual inheritance; his immutability, the rock of our safety; his eternity, the measure of duration to our own happiness. All this is God to men, who have made a covenant with him by sacrifice; all this, and much more, is God to believers, for Christ's sake. "Happy, indeed is the people, that is in such a case! yea, happy is that people, whose God is the Lord!"

Who, then, will not choose God for his portion? What earthly inheritance can be compared with it? What master besides can do so much for his servants, as, by their own cheerful testimony, God does for all his children? It is not the servants of God, but devotees to the world and to idols, that serve a hard master. "Their rock is not as our Rock, even our enemies themselves being judges."

Let the hundreds ~~and thousands~~ who have recently given themselves up to God, bless his name for the surrender. They have all chosen a portion of inestimable worth. "All things are theirs; and all things shall work together for good.' The perfections of God guaranty all this. And they may truly and confidently say, "Lo this God is our God forever and ever; He will be our guide even unto death.—Chris. Mirror.

From the Gospel Messenger.

THE LAST HOUR OF BEDE, THE VENERABLE.

BY MRS. ELIZABETH J. EAMES.

"Though the last illness of this learned and venerable man was severe, he spent his dying hour in translating the book of St. John; after which, kneeling in his wonted place of prayer, he invoked the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and immediately expired."

It was an eve of beauty.
One by one the stars came forth, like living gems,
On the broad brow of Heaven; and the moon took her place
In rare exceeding loveliness. Through the stain'd window
Of a quiet cell in old Northumbria's cloistered pile,
The bland and wooing air sent all sweet sounds and odors;
While silver-waving Tyne made bold deep music.
But unto one within that learned study
All outward things pass'd on unnoticed.
From his sight the pleasant world was fading fast—
